I capitalize 'Philosopher' to indicate the difference between Socrates and the character portrayed in the digression. The aforementioned commentators argue that Plato thus intends to point to the superiority of Socratic philosophy, which takes seriously the human realm, as opposed to the otherworldly abstractions of the Philosopher. What remains to be specified, however, is both what problem compelled Socrates to take human affairs seriously and how Socrates' focus on human affairs constitutes a response to this problem. For a list of the differences between Socrates and the Philosopher that are expressed within the Theaetetus as a whole, see Benitez and Guimaraes 1993, 300–1.

souls. As a result of having to argue out of self-interest, rather than orienting their speech on "that which is" as do the Philosophers, the orators "become sharp and shrewd...small and not upright in their souls" (172d9, 173a1–3).

Socrates responds to Theodorus' wish that he speak also of "our chorus," the Philosophers. But Socrates does not speak of the Philosopher's soul as he had spoken of the orator's. Instead, he enumerates all that the Philosopher simply neglects in the orator's political world. Socrates makes emphatically clear that this neglect is a serious error, leveling against the Philosopher his most significant charge: The Philosopher does not know that he does not know these things (173e1). To begin to discern exactly what the Philosopher has missed in his dismissal of politics we must consider just what it is that the Philosopher ignores. The Philosophers, Socrates states.

don't know the way to the marketplace, or where's a court, councilhouse, or anything else that's a common assembly of the city. And laws and decrees, spoken or written, they neither see nor hear, and the serious business of clubs for gaining office, and meetings, banquets, and revelries with flute girls—it doesn't even occur to them to do them in their dreams. And whether someone has been well-born or base-born in the city, or whether someone has incurred some evil from his ancestors, on the men's or women's side—he's less aware of it than of the proverbial pitchers of the sea. (173c8–e1)

Before considering this lengthy list, it is worth noting that at the beginning of the dialogue, Euclides, the transcriber of this conversation, reported that Socrates had exercised editorial oversight of the transcript of the conversation (143a3–4).<sup>28</sup> The items in the foregoing list reflect this care; each helps display the characteristics of political life.

The marketplace, of which Socrates speaks first, exists, most basically, because of our mutual dependence in the satisfaction of our corporeal needs. But in the satisfaction of these needs conflict arises. Individuals are not always willing to reconcile the satisfaction of their needs with the needs of others. And so government is necessary with its councilhouse, courts, and other common assemblies. These rely especially on the rule of law, which, as an amalgam of reason and coercion, implies that these differences can be controlled or minimized but not eliminated. The political community is thus always characterized by a conflict among parties that, in the pursuit of their divergent interests, engage in the pursuit of office and power within the community.

But these divisions are not only caused by the clashing of those needs we have as embodied beings. We want not only to eat but to engage in "banquets and revelry with flute girls" (cf. Symposium 212d6). In other words, we have psychic capacities, and needs, that find fulfillment in friendship and conversation. The political community attempts to respond to these higher aspirations, producing further distinctions among its citizens with regard to their nobility (173d4–5). But, as witness Socrates' plight, these needs may lead beyond what the community believes it can tolerate.

In his encapsulation of political life Socrates highlights those elements that portray it as a scene of persistent conflict. But given that political life exists as a response to human need, these conflicts must be regarded as reflective of tensions between and among these needs. The persistence of these tensions makes law, courts, and vying for office characteristic institutions of political life. The ongoing existence of these institutions suggests that the conflicts among humans and their needs may be only imperfectly reconcilable. The saga of Socrates' trial indicates just how imperfectly; even if all corporeal needs could be perfectly satisfied, there would still be the desire for the kinds of activities portrayed in the Symposium—that is, the desire to satisfy psychic needs for friendship, conversation, and beauty that can threaten the common good.

Socrates introduces the "digression" with the question of the natural status of justice, beauty, and piety precisely because their questionable status itself reflects an important fact about our natural constitution.<sup>29</sup> By including these among the political things, he recognizes that political communities attempt to respond to our psychic needs.<sup>30</sup> But by raising the question of their natural status, Socrates points to the essential controversy surrounding these virtues. He thus points to the complexity of human needs, which can give rise to variety, and thus difference, regarding notions of human fulfillment; from the variety of needs emerges a vast range of human potentials such that individuals can differ radically from one another while still being human. In short, this complexity of needs makes the meaning of human fulfillment or wholeness itself a problem. Socrates focuses on political life and its persistent conflicts to shed light on the problematic character of the human whole. This becomes ever more evident in what follows, as Socrates makes clear that in neglecting politics, what the Philosopher misses is precisely this problematic character. He also makes clear that this neglect is traceable to the founder of the philosophic tradition, Thales himself, and that the cost of this neglect is a lack of self-understanding.

Socrates describes the incident in which Thales, gazing aloft, fell into a well. His fall prompts a witty. Thracian slave girl to say that in his "eagerness to know the things in heaven Thales was unaware of the things in front of him and at his feet" (174a6–8). This comment, according to Socrates, is applicable to "all those who engage in philosophy" (174a4–b1). Socrates now maintains that the Philosopher appears laughable not only in public, as he had previously stated, but also "in private" whenever he must speak about the particulars "in a court or anywhere else" (174c1–2; emphasis added). This Philosopher, whose thought explores "everywhere every nature of each whole of the things which are...letting itself down to not one of the things nearby," appears absurd to Socrates as well as to the politicians (174a1–2).<sup>31</sup>

&lt;sup>28</sup> The Theaetetus begins with a prologue, occurring many years after Socrates' conversation with Theaetetus and Theodorus, in which Euclides and Terpsion, two Megarians who were acquaintances of both Theaetetus and Socrates, meet after Euclides happens upon the wounded and ill Theaetetus being carried to Athens. Their conversation turns to the discussion the young Theaetetus once had with Socrates. Euclides possesses an edited transcript of this discussion that he had developed with the contribution of Socrates himself. Euclides produces the book, and he and Terpsion listen as a slave boy reads it to them. This is the conversation that we hear. See 142a1–143c7. On the prologue see Wood 1999, 810–3, and Johnson 1998, 585–6, 594–7.

Among the particulars, "the things nearby," that the Philosopher finds difficult to discuss are his neighbors.

For someone of this sort has truly become unaware of his neighbor next-door, not only as to what he's doing but almost to the point of not knowing whether he is a human being or some different nursling. But what a human being is and in what respect it's suitable for a nature of that sort to act or be acted on that's different from all the rest—he seeks that.... (174b3)

The Philosopher bypasses his neighbor, the individual human, and focuses on human nature as a whole. However, this procedure actually precludes him from accurately grasping the human whole in all its complexity. In particular, he fails to see the perplexing diversity of human needs and the vast range of human possibilities that this diversity produces. The lack of selfunderstanding, manifest by his own words, makes this failure evident. For example, he finds trivial the possession of a great deal of land, "accustomed as he is to look at the entire earth" (174e4-5). Yet, while the Philosopher's mind may conceive of the entire earth, he like all other humans must occupy one small portion of it and derive his sustenance from it. Furthermore, when he hears praise of wealthy ancestry, "he's convinced the praise is from those whose sight is altogether dim and limited, who are incapable, by lack of education, of looking over all eternity" (174e7-175a1). But while he can reflect on eternity, he too is generated, born into a family on which he was dependent for, among other things, his education.

The Philosopher's neglect of human diversity is particularly on display when he does briefly address political life. Politics, for him, certainly does not involve the give and take among citizens necessary for the rule of law. In fact, he regards rule as a form of herding. The Philosopher thus banishes the ruled from humankind altogether; humans are "different nursling[s]" (174b3). Yet, in the course of speaking in this way, Socrates has the Philosopher call the one ruled "a more conspiratorial animal" (174d6–7). But of course to conspire is to speak, to plan, to deliberate—the province of humans alone (174e4–5, 175a1). Such beings are properly ruled not by herding but by law (nomos) (of which we are reminded by the frequent use of words in this context that have the nom stem), which, as an amalgam of reason and coercion, responds to both those aspects of our being expressed in the phrase, "conspiratorial animals" (174d4, 174d7, 174e1).

This understanding of humanity, reflected in the rule of law, is also evident, if unwittingly, in the Philosopher's very ridicule of the politicians. And this ridicule best reveals the impact of his ignorance of "the political things" on his self-understanding.<sup>32</sup> The Philosopher's ridicule would itself be ridiculous if those he criticized were not fellow humans; seldom do we ridicule herd animals for their inability to follow abstract arguments. But this ridicule also tacitly acknowledges the deep and perhaps unbridgeable distinctions between different ways of life. The Philosopher recognizes in the politician, and vice versa, the existence of a significantly different conception of the human good. Thus, the ridicule is comprehensive, touching on every aspect of life. But the mutual ridicule between the adherents of the two ways of life also shows that the followers of both want to be assured that they have chosen the right way, that their way of life will secure the good. The inability of both the Philosophers and the politicians to let an alternative way of life go unremarked, regarding it instead as an object of ridicule or a threat, expresses exactly this need for reassurance. It expresses a deep sense of uncertainty about what is the good that fulfills our humanity. But this is just where the Philosopher's self-understanding is deficient. He does not adequately appreciate that his own ridicule implies the questionability of the good. His focus on the wholes has obscured the source of this question-namely, the problematic character of the human whole.

Admittedly, given the vast range of human potential, our capacity to be in so many diverse and conflicting ways, everyone finds difficulty in considering what human fulfillment or maturity should mean for oneself as an individual. So great is this range that to predict accurately an individual's future can be regarded as a wondrous bit of prophecy (142c4-5) In the prologue Plato puts this perplexity of human wholeness before the reader in a variety of ways: by the remarkable device of providing a "snapshot" of the mature Theaetetus prior to recounting the story of the young Theaetetus; by having Euclides and Terpsion hold both Theaetetus and Socrates up as models, even though the one dies for the city that executes the other; and by having Euclides refer to Theaetetus as "beautiful and good," a phrase that evokes the vexed issue of the unity of human excellence (142b7).33 But the philosopher can least of all afford to neglect the problematic human whole, for in the Theaetetus it is the initial cause of that passage, see Howland 1998, 59–62.

The word, kala, beauty or nobility, points to the vexing problem of what should be meant by a beautiful or noble or fulfilled human being. Plato presents this problem near the beginning of the dialogue when Euclides describes Theaetetus as beautiful because of his many accomplishments, but Theodorus regards him as "not beautiful" in appearance. See 142b7 and 143e8 as well as 185e7–8. On the problem posed by beauty see Zuckert 2000, 55–8, 67–70.

wonder that Socrates designates as the beginning of philosophy (155d2–5).<sup>34</sup>

The name that Socrates gives to this problematic human whole is soul. In the "digression," soul refers to a living, growing thing capable of a variety of levels of development as dictated by one's education and way of life.35 The image is of the growth of a tree, which through improper care can be deprived of "growth" and "straightness," to become "bent and stunted" (173a3-4, b1). It is the assemblage of potentials, more and less fulfilled, that must find their realization in body. Socrates makes clear that because it does involve this kind of realization, we are capable of a vast array of possibilities; we certainly do not automatically achieve our full humanity. Reflection on the political things best discloses the problematic human whole. Yet, unlike Socrates, who certainly knows the way to the marketplace as well as the ancestry of his fellow citizens, the Philosopher dismisses the political things as "small and nothing" (144c5-8, 173e4). It is appropriate, then, that the discussion of the Philosopher's neglect of politics replaces an account of his soul. For in neglecting politics, in thinking that "his body alone is situated in the city," while his "thought" explores "everywhere every nature of each whole," the Philosopher neglects the soul (173e2-174a2). In so doing he reveals something of his own soul, specifically, his reluctance to encounter that which resists the certainty of quantification much as do the innumerable "proverbial pitchers of the sea" (173d8-9).36 He focuses instead on the "things in heaven," the wholes that he can believe are permanent and unchanging. He thus misses the point revealed by Socrates' own examination of politics: that our wholeness, the character of our fulfillment, is a question, and so then must be our good. But more specifically, as we see in what follows, this understanding of humanity, revealed by reflection on political life, makes particularly doubtful that advantage can be the ultimate human good.

The Imperishability of Evils

When, earlier in the dialogue, Socrates shifted the discussion to the problem of knowledge, it may have seemed that he acceded to Theaetetus' desire to avert his eyes from the perplexity surrounding the question of the goodness of his soul (145b1–9). Yet because this question asks the extent to which a particular individual fulfills his or her humanity, it is formally analogous to the problem of knowledge. Both concern the connection, if any, between the particulars and the wholes.<sup>37</sup>

<sup>34</sup> The several references to wonder in the prologue refer to an individual defying expectations. See 142a3, 142b9, and 142c4. Wonder at human nature continues in the initial exchanges between Socrates and Theodorus. See 144a2, 144b6, and 144d3.

Both the Philosophers and the Protagoreans wish to deny any tension between the particular and the whole. The former want to see only abstract wholes and the latter want to see only particulars, only discrete instances of perception. The evidence of the dialogue belies both views. The dubious character of the Protagorean claim is evident throughout the dialogue in its inevitable generation of self-contradiction. But, as we have just seen, the aspiration of the Philosopher to concern himself only with wholes is just as dubious. It is with respect to this dubious possibility that Socrates links our nature and our good most clearly.

He makes the key point in response to Theodorus, who, much taken with Socrates' account of the Philosopher, expresses the hope that if all could be persuaded by it, "peace would be more widespread and evils less among human beings" (176a4). With this statement, Theodorus shows his desire that all agree with him. He longs for a world in which all differences are absorbed into generalities, in which the rational necessity of mathematics compels the assent of all. The result would be a peace in which none would contest him. Responding to Theodorus, Socrates expresses one of the most far-reaching statements in the Platonic corpus about the nature of humanity and the world we inhabit:

But it's not possible for the evils either to perish, Theodorus—it's a necessity that there always be something contrary to the good—or for them to be established among gods, but of necessity they haunt mortal nature and this region here.... (176a5–8)

Together these two necessities define something crucial about our nature and thus our good. Let us consider them in more detail.

The first necessity is that evils cannot perish because there must always be something contrary to the good. If this is the case, then the existence of that which is good in itself must be dubious; that which is good is so only in relation to something else, specifically, in relation to evil (see Bolotin 1989, 172-73). Without evil, good does not exist. But why must good exist only in relation to evil? The second necessity helps answer this question in defining what is meant by evil. Evils are said to be a necessary aspect of mortal nature. They are thus linked to our finitude, to our lack of that perfect self-sufficiency assigned to the immortal gods. For this reason, evils are said to haunt "this region here" rather than the home of the gods (176a7-8). Death is, of course, a sign of this lack, but it is simply the most prominent sign of the general condition of deficiency or neediness that characterizes us insofar as we are mortal. Socrates' association of evils with mortality therefore also connects evils with this neediness.

To understand fully the imperishability of evils, however, the character of this neediness requires further specification. All living things are mortal and thus needy. But in associating the notions of good and evil with this neediness Socrates and his interlocutors have in mind specifically human neediness; Theodorus' hopes pertain to the evils "among human beings" and Socrates' response provides advice relevant only to humans (176a4, 176a8-b2).38 The specific character of human neediness is evident in the case of mortality. Human mortality includes not only the brute fact of our demise but also awareness of that fact. Plato frames the octet with this awareness, beginning with the dying Theaetetus being carried homeward and culminating with Socrates' discussion of immortality on his last day (142a6-b1; Phaedo).<sup>39</sup> This most dramatic example of our neediness provides further insight into what Socrates means by evils. For humans, evils are not only needs themselves but our awareness of these needs. Evil is a condition known as such, a condition that therefore might be otherwise. Specifically, it might be remedied or at least ameliorated by that which is thereby known as good. In sum, evil is neediness of which we are aware, and good is that which we judge might answer to this condition of neediness.

Yet the question remains why Socrates asserts the imperishability of evils so understood, that where there is good there must also be evil. Using the strong language of necessity, he implies that the existence of evil is inherent in the nature of things. This is a conclusion that follows, I think, directly from Socrates' reflections on those heterogeneous needs that dictate the character of political life. That is, because we are capable of being aware of our neediness, because therefore the very notion of good can become an issue for us, we necessarily have conflicting and irreconcilable needs. The psychic capacities that enable such awareness generate needs whose requirements are not perfectly compatible with corporeal needs. In other words, exactly insofar as we are capable of asking the question of good, our nature is such that all our needs cannot be perfectly satisfied. Socrates' use of the strong language of necessity is appropriate because inherent in the capacity that defines us, the capacity to ask of the good, is the existence of ineradicable need or imperishable evils. It is, finally, this existence of need, of evil, and thus of good that distinguishes the human region from the divine (176a6-7).

Given that the specific character of political life in general, and Socrates' trial in particular, has elucidated the irreconcilable character of human needs, it is appropriate that Socrates makes the claim about the imperishability of evils in response to Theodorus' desire for freedom from political life. Socrates, he hopes, might "persuade everyone" "to leave off from 'How am I wronging you, or you me?' and [turn] to the examination of justice itself" (175c1–3). Peace would be more widespread if Theodorus' desire to comprehend all particulars within wholes resulted in a transcendence of all individual claims by justice itself (176a4).

In Theodorus' dream, reason would have the power to answer all needs and thus bring about the perfect harmony of all individual goods in one common good. Theodorus' desire for freedom from politics is connected to his extravagant hopes for the power of reason or speech; he believes that his words could be effective even in Sparta (162b4–7).<sup>40</sup> These hopes reflect that desire for mastery promised by sophistry, with its ability to manipulate words and images to attain its ends. But political life, with its characteristic institutions of law and the courts, persists, testifying to the imperfect resolution of these particular goods. Reason, it seems, is incapable of overcoming fully that self-concern rooted in our individuated existence, which is, after all, itself the source of Theodorus' dream (170e1-3). No one could be more fully aware of these limits than Socrates himself, whose life-long pursuit of phronesis will soon result in his execution. Such awareness stands in stark contrast to the Philosopher, who, sharing Theodorus' dreams of freedom, longs to be more than human (172c8-d2).<sup>41</sup> However, the fulfillment of these dreams of freedom-from politics, from ambiguous words, from the body—so reminiscent of the Enlightenment hopes that persist in our own time, proves elusive. These dreams founder on the necessities that Socrates has adduced: the imperishability of evils, the ineradicable neediness, attendant on our mortal and complex nature.

The dubiousness of these dreams suggests that the good for us cannot be advantage alone because advantage is oriented precisely on achieving complete freedom from need. As such, it must necessarily distort the kind of being we are. But given the connection we have established between the good, on the one hand, and knowledge, on the other, if advantage cannot rightly be regarded as the ultimate human good, then the knowledge we seek in pursuit of our good cannot be oriented solely on the certainty that would supply this advantage. This is not to say that such knowledge cannot be a good. Whenever faced by "the greatest dangers...foundering on campaigns, in illnesses, or at sea," we seek rulers and teachers who "don't differ by anything else than by the fact they know" (170b1). There can be no doubt that knowledge that answers to our urgent needs—to

&lt;sup>39</sup> Mortality is present in several other ways in the prologue. Euclides mentions that Socrates met Theaetetus shortly before his death (142c6). And the city of Erineos, to which Euclides accompanied Theaetetus as he was being carried to Athens, is, as Benardete (1986, I.184, n. 3) notes, the place from which Hades abducted Persephone and carried her to the underworld. Burkert (1985, 161) states that through the Persephone story, "a dimension of death is introduced into life." See also Hesiod (Theogeny 773).

&lt;sup>40</sup> Theodorus, however, seems to sense that the very need for speech can be considered a limit. Theodorus states that he, "for some reason or another, inclined rather early away from bare speeches and toward geometry," (165a1-2). He perhaps believes that the symbols of geometry provide access to the world in a more immediate way than do the ambiguities and uncertainties of "bare speeches." Inherent in this belief, as in his desire for freedom from politics, is a desire for freedom from the body, the source of the need to rely on images—for the words that constitute speeches are precisely not (at least not wholly) the objects of perception but are rather the medium through which the things can be represented or expressed. And this mediacy, while being a source of freedom in granting the possibility to consider alternatives, also dictates a limit to that freedom; this difference between word and thing entails that the capacity to manipulate mental objects does not necessarily correspond to our capacity to manipulate the world, including human beings.

know with certainty, for example, which of the many objects in the world might heal or protect us—is good (Apology 22c9–d4). But such knowledge cannot be the ultimate goal of inquiry precisely because Socrates has maintained that evils are imperishable, that insofar as we can ask the question of our good, not all needs can be fully answered. The knowledge that might stand as the ultimate goal of inquiry would have to acknowledge this persistently needy condition and the problematic nature that underlies this neediness.

In this light, the knowledge that we most need concerns which of the many conflicting goods we ought to pursue. It is, in short, that phronesis in which Socrates doubts we are self-sufficient (169d5). Such knowledge could not be oriented on the "wholes" alone because if evils are ineradicable for all, then concerns that reflect this condition, concerns thought dismissable by the Philosopher, have crucial importance. The Philosopher, too, pursues his own good, and insofar as that good is the good of an embodied being, he cannot afford to focus only on unchanging intelligibles. He would have to consider as well "things at his feet and things before his eyes" (174c2-3). He would have to study those evils of which Socrates says the Philosopher is ignorant (174c7–8). No object of inquiry, practical or theoretical, could be precluded beforehand as unworthy of investigation. In particular, only such a being would see the need to understand the problem of knowledge as it is examined in the Theaetetus, the problem of relating universals and particulars that arises because of our mediated relationship with the world. Only such a being would need to understand the political things, including those virtues of justice, piety, and beauty dismissed as wholly conventional by Socrates' predecessors. In sum, such a being would seek the knowledge of all things.42

Taking his bearings from the criterion of certainty about the whole, the Philosopher is unable to defend the philosophic life because he shares with the political community the same view of good: to have the good in perpetuity, to be something more than human, to disregard his mortality as he "flies...above heaven" (173e5-6). Gazing at the stars instead of reflecting upon himself and his neighbor, the Thalesian Philosopher misses the problematic wholeness of humanity. More particularly, in failing to take politics seriously, Socrates' predecessors did not appreciate the necessarily questionable status of good. They are thus left unable to defend the good of their own way of life even to themselves. For this reason, Socrates ends his comparison of the two ways of life by saying that what distinguishes the Philosopher from the politicians is merely that he knows "how to arrange his cloak on the right in the character of a free man" (175e7). On the basis of this perfectly conventional distinction, there is no possibility of a reasoned defense of the life of reason. "This," Socrates tells Theodorus, "is the one you would call a philosopher" (175e1-2; emphasis added). In what immediately follows, Socrates paints a very different picture of the one he would call a philosopher. It is a portrayal of philosophy as the human good.

Socratic Philosophy

Because of the primacy of the question of the good in the human context, the articulation of Socratic philosophy involves a confrontation with the poet, Homer, as the general of the army of fluxists rather than with the philosophical flux theorists. It is Homer who provided the Greeks with their paradigmatic portrayal of the good life, in part through his depiction of the Olympian gods (Herodotus, History II.53).<sup>43</sup> Accordingly, the initial focus of Socrates' formulation concerns the philosopher's relationship with the "divine region." He begins specifically with the advice that the philosopher flee our region of evils for the divine region (176a8–b1).

Given Socrates' earlier statement regarding the relationship of evils and good, such a flight would also leave behind the notion of human good. It would fulfill the Philosopher's dream of being more than human. However, this advice, so reflective of the Philosopher's yearnings, quickly undergoes modification. The notion of actually going somewhere is not maintained (176b1–3). Furthermore, Socrates alters the meaning of this flight. Initially, 'flight' means "assimilation to a god." Subsequently, it is taken to mean "to become just and pious with phronesis," which Socrates equates with flight from wickedness, the opposite of the pursuit of virtue (176b1–5). What began sounding distinctly other-worldly becomes ever more terrestrialized.

The qualities to be pursued are, to say the least, not usually attributed to gods. Each involves an awareness of human limits and dependency. Justice, singularly lacking in many of the Greek pantheon, reflects human dependence on one another; piety, the possession of which by gods would be contradictory, involves an acknowledgment of subordination to that which transcends humanity. And, finally, there is phronesis. This intellectual capacity replaces beauty in the trio of virtues mentioned prior to the "digression." As we have seen, Socrates uses the word in contexts that bear directly on the special problem of knowing how one should live and thus the problem of knowing the character of human fulfillment or wholeness. As such, it is

&lt;sup>44</sup> Annas (1999, 64) states that this "unworldly strand" has its afterlife in religion. She associates its unworldliness with the definition of philosophy offered in the Phaedo, the culminating dialogue of the octet. There it is said that philosophy is preparation for death. But this definition can be understood in a wholly this-worldly manner. The same is true of Socrates' advice in the Theaetetus. On the Phaedo, see Stern 1993, 174–8, and Ahrensdorf 1995, 199–201.

tributing these virtues to the gods.

46 This replacement raises a question concerning Bradshaw's contention that the Philosopher, who is oriented on wholes, achieves his advantage more surely than does the orator-politician. On phronesis in the Theaetetus see also Polansky 1992, 142–8.

a capacity unnecessary for an eternally self-sufficient being such as a god. It is appropriate, then, that in this account of his own philosophic activity phronesis replaces beauty, that quality that at least holds out the promise of attainable human wholeness.

Just as the 'god' to whom Socrates advises assimilation is not quite like any recognizable member of the Greek pantheon, neither does the Socratic philosopher resemble the Philosopher previously encountered in the "digression." Socrates constructs this new version of the philosophic life in light of the necessities that have just been announced. With this new orientation of philosophy, Socrates also redefines just what distinguishes the philosopher from all others. He provides this definition through a critique of his opponents' rationale for practicing virtue and avoiding vice. This critique turns into a consideration of their view of wisdom.

Socrates holds that both the many and the sophists maintain that one practices virtue and avoids vice to seem to be good. Protagoras' followers, because they conceive of all goods other than advantage as merely conventional, are driven to this conclusion. However, Socrates also attributes this view to those who engage in "the practice of political power... and the arts" (176c6-d1). The many, the sophists and politicians, the practitioners of the arts—all those who desire what the arts aim to provide—freedom from need—share this view. But in addition, as long as philosophy takes its bearings by the criterion of certainty about the whole, it too shares this same motive and orientation. Socrates' predecessors must therefore also be included within this group.

Because virtue, for Socrates, is a cognitive matter—it is the recognition that trying to become as just as possible is true virtue and the failure to recognize this is vice—he identifies virtue with wisdom (176c4–5, 176b3–7).<sup>47</sup> And he distinguishes his wisdom from what he calls "vulgar" and "common" wisdom (176c7, 176d1). He elaborates on the non-Socratic view of wisdom by describing the self-understanding of one of its adherents. This one thinks himself "clever" (deinos)

by his criminal willingness to stop at nothing for they glory in the reproach and believe they're hearing that they're not utter nonsense, merely burdens of the earth, but that they're men as they ought to be in a city—those who will get themselves to safety. (176d2–5; emphasis added)

Socrates' allusion to Homer's Iliad leads to the heart of the distinction between the two views of wisdom. The italicized phrase is uttered by Achilles in grief over the death of his friend, Patroclus (Homer, Iliad XVIII. 104). Socrates' gloss on the allusion suggests that Achilles' view is oriented on the axis, death–safety. It is oriented, in particular, on the provision and security of one's own—one's own friends, family, and life. Believing that this is the good, those who hold this view conclude that wisdom, and human excellence in general, resides in directing all of our power toward securing this end. Thus, wisdom becomes identified with cleverness, the capacity to calculate the most efficacious means to the predetermined end of advantage.

This identification follows from the example of Homer's heroes, Achilles and Odysseus, through which he portrays death as the greatest threat to human good (Homer, Odyssey XI.489-91; Vernant 1996, 58).48 This Homeric conception spurs us to overcome those limits on our mortality, "to stop at nothing," in the hope that evils are not imperishable, that we might possess the good forever (177a8). Following the Homeric hero's example, these efforts should be aimed at the acquisition of that power and mastery, as signified by glory, that will grant us our heart's every desire, including above all our own perpetuation (Vernant 1996, 61). But as was the case for Achilles, and is so for each one of us, these efforts must ultimately fail. From this thwarted hope one might conclude that the world is a scene of instability, of senseless and ceaseless change, wholly inhospitable to human good. This nearly intolerable conclusion conduces to a belief in beings greater than we, beings such as the Olympian gods who care for us, reward and punish, altering what might otherwise be considered as unchangeable necessities. Plato portrays this psychology in Theaetetus' willingness to jettison immediately the flux doctrine, with which he had identified himself, when hearing of its negative impact on the authority of the gods (162c7–d2). Underlying both of these widely divergent views is a single concern, the concern for his own advantage. For this same reason, Homer can be both the authoritative source regarding the gods and the general of the army of fluxists. He articulates the view of good that underlies both.

To oppose this view is to strike at the very heart of the accepted notion of piety. Socrates does just that by rejecting the claim that the reward for living virtuously is some sanction apart from this life. Of those who do believe this Socrates states,

...They're ignorant of the penalty for injustice, and it's what they least ought to be ignorant of. For it's not what it is in their opinion, beatings and executions—people who do no injustice undergo them on occasion... (176d7-e1)

Those who are concerned above all with their own advantage, those for whom safety is preeminent, might well think that beatings and executions were the true punishments for the evil life. But this is to ignore what Socrates makes explicit: that it is often the just that are punished. It is the unwillingness to accept this fact that moves people to fill the world with gods that can provide the sort of order that the world evidently does not. Socrates resists the nearly irresistible desire to subscribe to this belief. Underlying his civic impiety stands his strong suspicion that the city's gods reflect the dubious Homeric conception of the human good.

But piety remains a virtue for Socrates; there is still that which we look up to—namely, the paradigm of the "divine and happy" life (176e3-4). The ultimate reward for living according to this paradigm, as opposed to the paradigm of the "godless and miserable" life, is not, however, some extraneous sanction. As was said of the orator's soul, each becomes more like these contrary "paradigms" through his own actions (176e3). The reward is the life that is lived (176e3-4). The ultimate penalty, too, is this-worldly. It is, in particular, to live life without seeing the true end, without seeing how things truly are. Socrates insists that the miserable life is followed not out of some evil inclination but from a failure to see clearly the alternatives; those who follow the godless and miserable paradigm do so by "folly and extreme foolishness" and act "unawares" (176e4-177a1). Its followers are those clever men who are in fact self-deceived, those who "are by so much more the sort they suspect they're not because they don't suspect it" (176d5-6). These clever students of Homer cannot help but be self-deceived. The belief that advantage is the good must involve self-deception insofar as it defies the necessities, including mortality, that define our existence. Socrates' criticism of the clever implies that the true good is, instead, the avoidance of self-deception, or clarity. The ultimate reward is to see our situation clearly, to see, and accept, that we do not inhabit a world that answers to all needs. The virtues of this life are those that reflect our limits: our dependence on others, on that which transcends us, and above all our persistent need for guidance regarding how to live our lives.

But why believe that this is our ultimate need, that the good lies in seeing how things truly are? Why think that by nature humans would rather live according to the way things really are, especially when so few do? Socrates suggests an answer when he maintains that following the wrong way is a matter of error rather than evil, that all really want the same thing but just do not see clearly enough. The "digression" supports this claim precisely in its portrayal of the ridicule to which the conflict between the two ways of life leads.

As I have maintained, this mutual ridicule shows that both desire reassurance concerning the goodness of their way of life because of the sense, more or less tacit, that they are not fully sure of the true human good. In speaking of the orators at the end of the "digression," Socrates points to one symptom of this desire: the self-dissatisfaction they experience when they cannot provide "an account (logos) of the things they blame" (177b1-7). The desire for assurance is evident not only in the orators but also in the reluctance of those who, like Theodorus and Theaetetus, avoid giving "an account (logos)" because they fear an outcome similar to that of the orator; in the widespread adherence to beliefs, such as those provided by Homer, that offer such assurance at the cost of obscuring a clear view of our own nature; and, finally, in the Philosopher's contemptuous dismissal of political life (169a7). Each of these is a reaction to doubt, and a concomitant desire for reassurance, that one's good is truly good.

Through his conversation with Theaetetus and Theodorus, Socrates perceives that this powerful desire can drive even these extremely intelligent interlocutors to adopt self-contradictory views. Such conversations provide Socrates himself with some assurance that his desire for what is truly good is not idiosyncratic; this desire is evident, if unwittingly, in the words and deeds of others. Socrates' "terrible love" of speeches thus benefits the young Theaetetus in pointing toward the surer, if more arduous, path to the good (169c1). But his conversations also benefit himself, in making possible a reasoned defense of his chosen way of life. On the basis of the universal desire for that which is truly good, and on the basis of the equally universal sense, more or less tacit, that certainty regarding the good eludes us, Socrates can legitimately claim that his way of life at least brings him closer to what humans by nature want. The distinction between Socrates' way of life and that of others is thus not simply conventional.

CONCLUSION

Socrates bases the defense of his life of philosophic inquiry on his understanding that the question and the questionability of good provides the unavoidable, the natural, framework for all human activity. Everyone depicted in the "digression" inhabits a world defined by this question; the Philosopher's judgment that the political things are "small and nothing" emerges from a view of good as much as does the slave girl's laughter. The discussion leading up to the "digression" shows that this unalienable concern for good comprehends our epistemic commitments such that it determines what it is we take knowledge to be. Accordingly, Socrates' reflections on political life, which make dubious the widely held view that advantage is the sole good, must also bear on the meaning of knowledge. Specifically, through showing that humans are ineluctably needy, these reflections imply that advantage, which aims at the eradication of need, cannot be the ultimate understanding of human good. This conclusion also makes dubious the idea that the certainty that will provide that advantage must be the sole criterion of knowledge. Because we lack godlike self-sufficiency, the proper goal of our inquiry is knowledge of all things, including the perplexities and uncertainties that necessarily accompany our existence. Given the persistence and irreconcilability of our needs, chief among these perplexities is the character of the human good. It remains a continuing object of inquiry from which no matter can be precluded without prior investigation. Accordingly, the philosophic life involves a search for phronesis rather than its presumed possession (Statesman 272c4).

In substantiating the good of philosophy so understood, the political character of the human context is crucial. Because this political context embeds inquiry, like all human activities, in the question of good, it prevents the self-forgetting stance of Theodorus, who ignores the human meaning of his activity. Moreover, the inherently conflictual nature of political life obstructs the perfect reconciliation of all differences in one perefectly common good. It thus undermines those Theodoran dreams that overestimate the power of reason. Finally, in showing that our wholeness is problematic, Socrates' consideration of the political character of the human context lets us see that the question of our good thus endures and, most importantly, that so then does the need for inquiry.

This message of the Theaetetus' central passage is a gift for the young, immature Theaetetus. Socrates shows him that it is only by appreciating the problem of becoming a full human that one achieves full humanity. Failing to do so, Theaetetus will not fulfill his much vaunted potential; he will rather be like those "who seem to be no different from children" (177b6-7). But the central passage of the Theaetetus is a gift not only for Theaetetus. In the climax of his life, Socrates carefully edits the written version of the entire conversation with Theaetetus and Theodorus, aiming to reach not only his interlocutors, but also all those potential philosophers to whom this conversation will be transmitted through the schools of philosophy (142d6–143a5).<sup>49</sup> At the heart of this conversation is a brief for Socrates' upcoming trial, a brief that prepares its readers to grasp the philosophic meaning of that trial. This is Socrates' gift to his philosophic heirs. For the central passage of the Theaetetus teaches that Socrates' philosophical inquiry into political life becomes necessary primarily not as a response to political dilemmas but, rather, to understand and defend the possibility of philosophy to philosophers.

The primacy of this motive suggests that understanding political life should remain central to philosophy insofar as philosophy, among all intellectual endeavors, requires awareness of its preconditions. But the primacy of this motive also informs the guidance that philosophy might give to politics. In particular, the affinities between the philosophy of Plato's Socrates and democratic practices should be understood to derive not from Socrates' particular political context but from the extent to which such practices are thought to comport with the requirements of Socratic philosophy. Thus, for example, the Platonic philosopher would resist the tyrannical urge to eradicate the diversity of views of good, inherent in distinctively political life, because this would be to destroy the very rationale for philosophic inquiry.<sup>50</sup> Similarly, in the conversational character of Socratic philosophy, in its demand for a logos defending one's way of life, and in the consequent freedom of speech required to provide such a logos, we might well find Platonic arguments to favor that political community in which these characteristics are most persistently present.<sup>51</sup> But if we turn to Plato for such guidance we should be clear about the standpoint from which all these arguments flow. Any understanding of the guidance Plato might offer our politics must begin and end with a consideration of that standpoint: the good of the life of philosophic inquiry.

The Logic of Strategic Defection: Court–Executive Relations in Argentina Under Dictatorship and Democracy

GRETCHEN HELMKE University of Notre Dame

Building on the separation-of-powers approach in American politics, this article develops a new micro-level account of judicial decision-making in contexts where judges face institutional insecurity. Against conventional wisdom, I argue that under certain conditions the lack of judicial independence motivates judges to "strategically defect" against the government once it begins losing power. The result is a reverse legal-political cycle in which antigovernment decisions cluster at the end of weak governments. Original data on more than 7,500 individual decisions by Argentine Supreme Court justices (1976–1995) are used to test hypotheses about why, when, and in which types of cases judges are likely to engage in strategic defection. Consistent with the theory's predictions, the results of the analysis show a significant increase in antigovernment decisions occurring at the end of weak dictatorships and weak democratic governments. Examining subsets of decisions and controlling for several additional variables further corroborate the strategic account.

All judges are politicians, whether they know it or not.

Enrique Petracchi, Argentine Supreme Court Justice, 1983-present (Abramovich 1992)

7 hy do judges rule against the government? Standard answers suggest that judges do so only if they are independent (Larkins 1998; Stotzsky 1993). Although contemporary scholars disagree over how to define and measure judicial independence, the assumption that it is a necessary, if insufficient, condition for a functioning system of interbranch checks and balances has remained unquestioned since Hamilton's ([1787] 1961, 471) eloquent observation that judges who lack independence will rarely "hazard the displeasure" of those in power. Yet even casual observation of judicial behavior in institutionally insecure environments suggests that the facts do not fully support this assertion. From Franco's authoritarian Spain, where judges routinely expressed views at odds with the government, to countries such as Guatemala and Peru, where judges refused to legitimize autogolpes (self-coups) staged by sitting executives, to Argentina, where judges have sent to prison the very politicians by whom they were appointed, evidence suggests that judicial decision-making varies a great deal even where the basic institutional requisites for independence are conspicuously absent.

If the existing literature offers little insight into why dependent judges sometimes serve to check their governments, how can we make sense of this behavior? I develop one set of answers to this question by building on the emerging separation-of-powers approach in American politics. In contrast to legalistic approaches that assume apolitical judges and approaches that focus on judges' attitudes or ideologies, the separation-of-powers approach treats judges as rational decision-makers who are constrained by other institutional actors (see, e.g., Epstein and Knight 1996, 1998; Ferejohn and Weingast 1992; and Spiller and Gely 1990). Whereas strategic approaches in the American politics literature have been criticized on the grounds that judges are relatively insulated from the alleged pressures imposed by other actors (Segal 1997). I argue that precisely because such institutional protections are in short supply in many parts of the developing world, the separation-of-powers approach should prove particularly compelling for analyzing judicial behavior beyond the American context.

Extending the separation-of-powers approach to new institutional settings yields several intuitive but novel predictions about judges' reactions to their political environment. Most fundamentally, in stark contrast to the conventional wisdom sketched above, I argue that under certain conditions the very lack of independence motivates judges to challenge the other branches of government. Specifically, once the government in office begins to lose power, judges who lack institutional security begin facing incentives to increase their antigovernment rulings to distance themselves from a weakening government. I refer to this phenomenon as strategic defection. Taking into account factors such as the degree of institutional security that judges face, the number of relevant political actors, and the timing of sanctions, the theory of strategic defection predicts a reverse legal-political cycle in which antigovernment decisions increase at the end of weak governments and are handed down by the very judges whom the government had earlier appointed. The logic of strategic defection offers an important but heretofore undertheorized mechanism for analyzing a variety of interinstitutional behaviors under dictatorships and democracies alike.

The Argentine Supreme Court presents a textbook case for examining the theory of strategic defection. Despite the constitutional guarantee of lifetime tenure for Argentine Supreme Court justices, the decades of political instability that plagued Argentina from the 1930s through the 1980s resulted in the de facto norm of removing and replacing the members of the Supreme Court with each regime transition. In the period examined here, the Court was replaced en masse by the military following the coup in 1976 and again by the incoming democratic government of Raul Alfonsín in 1983. This institutional insecurity continued even as democracy consolidated. As recently as 1990 newly elected president Carlos Menem gained control over the Court through a court-packing scheme that ultimately enabled him to appoint six of the nine justices to the bench.

THE SEPARATION-OF-POWERS APPROACH IN A COMPARATIVE PERSPECTIVE: THE THEORY OF STRATEGIC DEFECTION

In extending the separation-of-powers framework beyond the United States, I begin with three observations. First, in many parts of the developing world, judges face threats far greater than simply having their decisions overturned. In such contexts, sanctions range from impeachment, removal, and court-packing to criminal indictment, physical violence, and even death. Compared to American justices, who serve an average of 16.3 years on the bench, in Argentina in the post-Perón period, the average length of tenure has been a mere 5.6 years (see Table 1). Although judges stepped down for a variety of reasons throughout each of the three governments, multiple resignations clustered at the end of both the military and the first democratic government of Alfonsín suggest that incoming governments in Argentina routinely get rid of their predecessors' judges despite constitutional guarantees.

Second, in many developing countries the de facto concentration of power in the executive branch eclipses the formal institutional judicial sanctioning powers granted to the legislature. This is particularly true in Latin America, where despite constitutional guarantees, the functional separation of powers is notoriously weak or absent and power is concentrated heavily in the executive branch (O'Donnell 1994). The weakness of these other institutions thus also tends to increase dramatically the threat judges face, for sanctions against the judges are unlikely to be successfully blocked by third-party actors such as the legislature.

Third, in many developing countries the primary threat to judges comes not from incumbent governments but from incoming ones. This follows from the fact that those with the greatest incentives to sanction justices are not those who appoint them but, rather, those who succeed the appointing government. Theoretically, this means that the appropriate locale of what Ferejohn and Weingast (1992) refer to as the "intertemporal conflict of interest" shifts from one between past and current governments to one based on the current, incumbent executive and the future, incoming executive. Under this alternative scenario judges face incentives to curry favor not with the current government but, rather, with the future government.

Taken together, the first two points suggest that judges' incentives to engage in strategic behavior in developing democracies are potentially far greater than in developed democracies. The third point implies a difference based not on mere degree but, rather, on the particular repertoire of strategic behavior that emerges. When judges believe that they are constrained by incoming governments who oppose the incumbent government, their best response may not be to support the current government (e.g. Epstein and Knight 1996) but, rather, to defect from it.

Figure 1 provides a basic strategic setting that illustrates the logic of strategic defection. The figure depicts a sequence of decisions with the current government (G1) moving first, the court (C) second, Nature (N) third, and the future government (G2) fourth. In the first stage, the current government acts by selecting justices for the court. In the second stage, these justices rule on policies of this government, either upholding or overruling the policies of the government. In the third stage, Nature selects the next government, with a probability p that the incumbents will remain and 1-p that opponents will take office. In the fourth and final stage, the future government decides whether to sanction the court based on the court's decisions made under the previous government.

For the sake of simplicity, assume that the basic rule that guides the actors' choices is that if the court has decided cases close to the views of the incoming government, the future government will be less likely to sanction the justices. If the court has decided cases against the views of the new incumbents, however, the future government will be more likely to sanction the justices.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>3</sup> A more general assumption is that judges are uncertain about the incoming government's type. If an incoming government cares about

The first implication is that in only two circumstances will the incoming government be unlikely to sanction justices who continued to rule in favor of the previous government. The first condition is when the current government itself is strong and able to maintain itself in power; that is, G1 = G2. The second is when the incumbents lose to the opposition, but the location of the new government's ideal points is such that it prefers G1 to SQ, where SQ is the status quo (see Figure 2A). Such a circumstance might obtain, for example, if there are relatively few policy differences between the outgoing and the incoming governments. In these circumstances, incoming governments will have little incentive to punish their opponents' court, even if the court that served under the previous government continues to rule in its favor.

In all other circumstances, future governments will have incentives to sanction justices who continued to rule in favor of the previous government. If the incoming government opposes the policies of its predecessors such that it prefers that its opponents' policies do not become law, then, in effect, the future government can be said to favor the status quo (that is, the condition that obtains whenever the policies of the current government are not enacted). In short, future rulers will have an incentive to sanction justices loyal to the previous government (judges whose decisions fall between G1 and SQ) whenever SQ is between G1 and G2 (see Figure 2B).

I am now in a position to propose a new set of answers to the question of why, when, and in which cases judges who lack independence are likely to rule against the government. Assuming that judges wish to avoid sanctions, loyalty to the current government clearly may not be the best strategy. Instead, once the government in office begins to lose power, judges will face incentives to engage in strategic defection.<sup>4</sup> Stated as a testable hypothesis, the first prediction is as follows.

Hypothesis 1. Judges will increase their rulings against the current government once the prospect emerges that the current government will lose power.

Moreover, to the extent that judges use strategic defection to mitigate the sanctions they face, it follows legitimacy, it might not sanction judges regardless of what the judges do. But if judges are uncertain about the next government, strategic defection will never hurt them and could help them.

that defection should occur in cases about which the opposition is likely to care most. Thus, the second prediction can be stated as follows.

Hypothesis 2. All else equal, judges will concentrate their defection in cases that are considered most important to the incoming government.

Evidence would be inconsistent with these hypotheses if judges facing sanctions remained loyal to the outgoing government or if antigovernment decisions were limited to relatively minor cases.

DATA AND RESEARCH DESIGN

Elsewhere, I have tested the theory of strategic defection by considering high-profile cases such as the reelection case involving Menem's bid for a third term in office in 1999 (Helmke n.d.). Here I use new individual-level data on the Argentine Supreme Court justices' decisions between 1976 and 1995, contained in the Argentine Supreme Court Decisions Database (ASCD), which I constructed.<sup>5</sup> I compare the behavior of justices in periods of relative institutional security to their behavior in periods of relative insecurity. Inferences about strategic defection are thus based not simply on the total percentage of antigovernment decisions, which may be affected by any number of factors, but on whether the willingness of judges to rule against the government changes relative to changes in their political environment. In this section I briefly describe the organization and decision-making process of the Argentine Supreme Court, explain how the data needed to test the hypotheses were gathered, and discuss the operationalization of several key variables.

The Argentine Judiciary and the ASCD Database

The Argentine Supreme Court (Corte Suprema de Justicia de la Nación) stands at the head of a federal judiciary established by the Constitution of 1853, modeled on the United States Constitution, and recently reformed in 1994. The Argentine Supreme Court is the highest court in the country, with original and appellate jurisdiction over all federal questions. In 1887, the Court established through its own jurisprudence the power of judicial review. It cannot exercise abstract review. Once a case arrives at the Argentine Supreme Court it is circulated among the nine justices, who may either sign the draft opinion or write a separate opinion. The order in which a justice receives the case depends on the type of appeal filed.<sup>7</sup> Justices meet either weekly or biweekly in sessions called acuerdos, mainly to sign opinions and occasionally to discuss cases. There are no oral proceedings and the records of weekly meetings are not publicly available. Moreover, the norm is that while all of the justices who agree with the opinion of the majority sign it, the actual "author" of the opinion remains anonymous (Carrió 1996). Nevertheless, for all full opinions<sup>8</sup> the judges in the majority are listed at the end of the opinion and the identities of those justices who sign separate dissents and concurrences are also clear, allowing me to code the individual justices' positions.

One of the main challenges involved in constructing the database was developing a reliable and systematic method for selecting cases in which the government had an identifiable interest. Unlike the U.S. Supreme Court, the Argentine Supreme Court decides thousands of cases annually.9 Many of these are relatively unimportant legally and politically, raising the issue of which cases were most appropriate for evaluating the strategic behavior of Argentine justices. After considering several alternatives, 10 I used the indexes contained in the back of each volume of Argentine Supreme Court decisions (Fallos de la Corte Suprema de Justicia de la Nación) to generate a complete list of cases that met one or both of the following criteria: (1) the case named the state as a party and (2) the case named a decree passed by the current executive. Using these two criteria ensured that all cases in which the government had an interest would be selected. By coding additional information on case type, appeals brought by the government, and types of issues (described below), I can address the concern that the government may not care equally about winning all of the cases in which it is a party or in which the legality of a particular decree is at stake. The total number of individual votes based on these cases is 7,562.11 These votes are coded

8 All judicial decisions are either full or summary opinions. However, because justices do not sign summary opinions, individual votes can be coded only for full opinion cases.

&lt;sup>9</sup> From 1974 to 1994 the annual number of cases entering the Court averaged between 4,000 and 6,000, but it has risen to more than 36,000 cases since 1997 (FORES 1988, 1/3; Corte Suprema de Justicia de la Nación Secretaria Letrada de Estadisticas 1998; Molinelli, Palanza, and Sin 1999, 710). Each justice currently receives an average of 50 cases per day (anonymous interview, Buenos Aires, July 2001).

Regime, Government, and Political Timing

Testing the strategic defection explanation requires, first and foremost, a measure of the judges' expectations about the threats they face and the ability of the incumbent government to remain in power. Because it is impossible to measure directly the justices' beliefs about their own and the government's future, I generate proxy measures for the justices' expectations by drawing on primary and secondary accounts of political events during the three governmental periods examined. Each entry contained in the ASCD database records the exact date on which the decision was officially handed down. Based on this information, I created a series of dichotomous timing variables that allow me to model the changes in the justices' perceptions about their political environment. Under the military, the earliest plausible beginning for the transitional period in which judges would have expected the military to lose power was two years prior to the regime change. 13 Under the two democratic governments examined, the midterm parliamentary elections two years before the presidential elections serve as the earliest cutoff points for establishing the transitional period.<sup>14</sup> Beginning with the two-year cutoff point, I then capture each transition by creating a series of dummy variables with adjusted cutoff points at eighteen, twelve, 6, and 3 months. These cutoff points generate a series of transition variables—final 24 months, final 18 months, final 12 months, final 6 months, final 3 months—which allow me to assess how judges' behavior changes as an election approaches and a change to a new government becomes increasingly likely. I assign a value of one to all decisions falling within the periods of the transitions. All other decisions take a value of Zero.<sup>15</sup>

Additional Control Variables: Case Importance, Composition, Issue Categories

All of the individual votes analyzed in this article are based on full opinion cases. Thus, the data on individual decisions already deal with a subset of cases considered sufficiently relevant by the justices to warrant a full opinion. To provide additional measures of case importance, I constructed four dummy variables. 16 The first variable, Decree, provides a rough measure of importance based on political rather than legal criteria. Because these cases involve only decrees passed by the sitting government, this measure distinguishes decisions that deal with timely political issues from decisions involving the government as a litigant, which, as result of case backlog, may be less important by the time the cases reach the Supreme Court. The second variable, Salient Decree, takes account of the fact that not all decrees passed are necessarily of equal importance (e.g., Ferreira Rubio and Gorretti 1998). To deal with this concern, I selected a subset of the decree cases that dealt with issues considered to be especially relevant under each of the three governments, including cases involving issues of constitutional interpretation, amparo cases, 17 and habeas corpus cases. To address the further concern that the government may not care equally about winning all cases, I constructed Appeal as a dichotomous variable that distinguishes cases in which the government lost in the lower court and filed an appeal to bring the case to the Supreme Court. Finally, to measure the Court's level of effort as an indicator of importance, the fourth variable, Overturn, distinguishes cases where the Court had to overturn a favorable decision handed down by a lower court to rule against the government from cases where it upheld a negative decision. To account for individual-specific effects, I include dummy variables for each judge on the Court at the time the decision was handed down. Additional dummy variables are included to deal with the possible effects of the Court's composition and the mix of cases coming before the Court. The Appendix includes a complete list of the issue variables used in the analysis.

EVALUATING STRATEGIC MODELS OF JUDICIAL DECISION-MAKING ON THE ARGENTINE SUPREME COURT

Confidence in inferences about strategic defection increases as alternative explanations for such change can be ruled out. 18 For example, if the mix of cases being the probability of antigovernment decisions but, rather, the judges' perception that the government will lose power. Dummy variables model the change in the judges' perception as discontinuous.

<sup>18</sup> Ideally, to evaluate the strategic account one would use an independent measure of the justices' attitudes, for example, a

Decisions decided against the state on the merits that make important concessions to the government are coded "partially against." Decisions decided for the state on the merits but that make important concessions to the other litigant are coded "partially for." Because less than 1% of the cases contain partial votes, here I recoded the "partially against" decisions as "against" and the "partially for" decisions as "for."

Although there was great uncertainty about the democratic transition (Munck 1998; O'Donnell and Schmitter 1986), by 1981 the opening of dialogue with the opposition, mass human rights protests, the palace coup against Viola, and the failing economy suggested that the military regime could lose power (Nino 1996). In Argentina's leading law journals the future fate of the military's justices was debated, suggesting that the justices were aware of the threat they faced if the military left power (Carrió 1996).

14 During the last two years (1987–1989), Alfonsín's government was crippled by labor strikes (McGuire 1997), mass protests, military rebellions, and successive rounds of hyperinflation. The Radicals lost seats in the 1987 midterm elections, and Alfonsín's approval ratings fell steadily, from 42% in April 1987 to 9% prior to the 1989 election (Catterberg 1991). Menem's popularity grew during the first administration (Levitsky n.d.; Stokes 2001). In 1993 the Peronist Party swept the midterm elections. The 1994 constitutional reforms changed the presidential term from a single six-year term to two four-year terms, allowing Menem to win a second term in 1995 (Acuña 1995).

decided by judges is relatively stable over time, a significant increase in antigovernment decisions clustered at the end of a government's term cannot be fully explained by a nonstrategic account. Put differently, the null hypothesis is that if the mix of cases is stable and judges are not reacting strategically to changes in their political environment, then antigovernment decisions should occur at approximately the same rate throughout the government's term.

Timing

The timing hypothesis states that when judges lack secure tenure, antigovernment decisions will increase once judges perceive that the government in office is beginning to lose power. Given the evidence regarding the growing weakness of the military and Alfonsín governments, the specific prediction is that judges during both periods began to turn against the government once it began to lose power. As discussed above, I examine this shift in justices' perceptions between two years and three months prior to the change in government. For the third period examined, the relative strength of the first Menem administration suggests that the justices lacked similar incentives to defect at the end of Menem's first term. Thus, evidence would be consistent with the timing hypothesis if antigovernment decisions increased at the end of the first two governments but not at the end of the third government.<sup>19</sup>

Figure 3, showing trends in antigovernment decisions by year across each of the three governments, strongly supports the patterns predicted by the first strategic defection hypothesis. Under both the military and the Alfonsín governments, judges increased their antigovernment rulings during the last two years of each government as it became increasingly likely that the incumbents would lose power. Under the military regime in the years through 1980, judges ruled against the government in 36% of cases on average. But in 1982 and 1983, once it became likely that a transition would occur, judges increased their percentage of antigovernment rulings considerably, to 48 and 46%. Under the Alfonsín government, antigovernment rulings also began at a relatively low level and then rose as the government became increasingly weak. From 1983 to 1987, antigovernment rulings occurred in only about 37% of all decisions. In 1988 and 1989, antigovernment rulings rose to an average of 47% of all judicial decisions.

liberal-conservative scale is used in the American literature (Segal 1997). No comparable data on judicial preferences exist for developing countries. Assuming that governments appoint like-minded judges, the fact that each Argentine government selected its own

In contrast, during the first Menem government (1989–1995), when the justices did not face a credible threat, there was no increase in antigovernment decisions. Indeed, consistent with the logic of strategic defection, the patterns in the individual-level data show that as Menem became increasingly popular and as it became more likely that he would stand for a second term, the percentage of antigovernment decisions declined. Under Menem, the percentage of antigovernment rulings began at roughly the same level as in the early years of the two previous governments, increased to 40% in 1993, but then fell to roughly 25% during the last two years of Menem's first administration. This was a period of success for Menem's economic policies and an increasing likelihood of Menem's bid for reelection.

To delve further into the relationship between changes in the political environment and changes in patterns of judicial decision-making, I employed a series of logit models.<sup>20</sup> The results for each period are presented in Table 2. Beginning with the military period, the results for Models 1-6 overwhelmingly support the timing hypothesis. Consistent with the prediction that judges would increasingly decide cases against weak governments, every transition coefficient for the military period contained in Models 1, 2, and 3 is negative and statistically significant at the  $p \le 0.05$  level or better. Calculating the marginal effects for these coefficients reveals that in the 24, 18, and 12 months prior to the regime transition, the likelihood of the justices voting against the government increased by 20, 21, and seven percentage points, respectively. Somewhat less convincing are the results of Models 4 and 5, which examine the decisions of judges during only the last six- and three-month periods prior to the regime transition. Here the coefficients are also negative but fall short of statistical significance. One interpretation, majority partially alleviates this problem.

19 Using timing variables raises ambiguities for the strategic account: Justices may rule against unpopular governments to build popular support (Epp 1998; Gibson, Caldeira, and Baird 1998). However, to the extent that democratically elected incoming governments reflect the public's views, this is hardly at odds with a strategic account (Epstein and Knight 1998; Stimson, Mackuen, and Erikson 1995; Vanberg 2000, 2001). Future research can further determine whether changes in public opinion are sufficient to cause a change in the behavior of the Court by examining judges' decisions in cases where the government's and the public's preferences diverge.

somewhat troubling from the perspective of strategic defection, is that the willingness of justices to decide cases against the government peaks at the beginning of the transitional period but declines in the final months before the regime change. A different interpretation is that when the timing cutoff points are altered, the model ends up lumping the previous transitional period effects into the pretransitional period, thus decreasing the effects of moving from one period to another. This could also explain why the likelihood declines from 21 to 7 percentage points when moving from the 18- to the 12-month period prior to the transition.

To examine which of these two interpretations provides the better explanation, I excluded all decisions between 24 and 4 months prior to the end of the regime, thus enabling me to compare directly the period in which judges had the least information about the prospects of the sitting government (before the last two years) to the period in which judges had the most information (the last three months). The results clearly favor the second interpretation. Consistent with the strategic account, the coefficient, final 3 vs. pre-24 months, for Model 6 (-0.61) is negative and statistically significant, suggesting that as the transition drew near.

justices were continuing to defect against the government. According to the marginal effects, compared to the first five years of the dictatorship, in the final three months of the transitional period justices were more likely to vote against the government by 15 percentage points.

Repeating the analysis for the second period under the new democratic government of Raul Alfonsín yields equally impressive results. In Table 2, all of the coefficients from Models 7-12 are negative, and with the exception of the six-month transition variable (-0.39), all are statistically significant. Indeed, the statistical significance of the coefficient (-0.59) in Model 11 shows that even without excluding the interim period, justices in the final three months of the Alfonsín regime were significantly more likely to rule against the government. The willingness of judges to rule against the government increased by approximately 9 percentage points for each cutoff point, reaching to 15 percentage points in the final three months prior to the 1989 presidential election compared to the period prior to the 1987 midterm elections.

Shifting the focus to the decision-making pattern among judges under the government of Carlos Menem, the evidence presented in Table 2 overwhelmingly supports the prediction for null cases consistent with the theory of strategic defection. As expected, none of the coefficients in Models 13-18 is negative, confirming the expectation that antigovernment decisions would not increase at the end of Menem's highly successful first government. Indeed, in the midst of Menem's run for reelection, the coefficients (0.48 and 0.49) for the final year and the final six months before the end of this first term show that justices were significantly more likely to support the government in its last year prior to Menem's reelection. The marginal effect of the last year on the justices' behavior was to increase by 11 percentage points the justices' willingness to hand down a favorable governmental decision. Although it is difficult to distinguish here between strategic and sincere behavior, the fact that the justices under Menem increased their progovernmental decisions in the final year before his reelection fits well within the longstanding suspicion that insecure tenure amplifies the willingness of judges to curry favor with the government, but only when governments themselves are seen as likely to remain in power. In sum, the patterns in the data on judicial decisions under each of the three governments support the prediction that when judges face uncertain futures, they increasingly decide cases against the outgoing government.<sup>21</sup>

Importance

I now turn to the second main hypothesis, which predicts that when judges defect, they will do so in the most important cases. Table 3 provides information on the behavior of Argentine judges in the most important decisions they make. Among decisions involving decrees and in the subset of salient decree decisions, these data show large increases in antigovernment decisions clustered at the end of the first and second transition periods. In each of the first two groups, the overall number of decisions increased as the cases involving decrees passed by the executive reached the Court, and, quite dramatically, so did the percentage of antigovernment decisions, as shown by the jump from 21% in 1981 to 48 and 51% in 1982 and 1983, respectively. A similar trend occurred at the end of the Alfonsín government, with the sole exception of 1986, when antigovernment decisions peaked. Also in line with the theory of strategic defection is that antigovernment decisions among both groups of decree cases did not exhibit a similar pattern under Menem.

The findings for the three additional categories are somewhat more mixed. In cases where the government clearly had an interest in appealing a negative lower court decision, the percentage of antigovernment decisions increased only modestly in the first transition and actually declined to its lowest level in 1988. The subset of decisions in which the justices had to overturn a progovernment decision supports the theory of strategic defection, particularly for the second transition, when the percentage of antigovernment decisions increased dramatically, from an average of 25% in the first four years to 45% in the government's final two years. Undoubtedly as a result of the Dirty War waged by the military against "subversives" in the late 1970s, most habeas corpus cases were concentrated under the military government. Despite the relatively small number of decisions in this category, the jump from 0% in 1981 to 69% in 1982 strongly supports the idea that when defection occurs, it is in the most politically charged cases.

Logistic regression models estimated for each subset of cases under the military and Alfonsín governments (Table 4) confirm these overall patterns. All of the coefficients for the final 24 months for the first transition are negative, with three of the four coefficients achieving statistical significance at the 0.001 level. The likelihood of antigovernment decisions increased by 56 percentage points among decree cases, by 55 percentage points among the salient decree cases, by 23 percentage points among government appeals cases, and by 16 percentage points among cases overturning a favorable lower court decision.

Consistent with the overall patterns identified in Table 3 for the Alfonsín period, three of the four timing coefficients in Table 4 are also negative. For this period, the likelihood of handing down an antigovernment decision in decree cases, salient decree cases, and cases where the decision of the lower court had favored the government increased by 12, 12, and 16 percentage points, respectively, during the final two years of the Alfonsín government. Overall, the data reveal systematic support for the hypothesis that when judges defect, they do so in the most important cases.

Assessing Alternative Explanations

Composition. I now consider two sets of competing explanations for the increase in antigovernment decisions. The first alternative explanation is that changes in the composition of the Court during each of the governments' terms may account for the increase in antigovernment decisions. If the composition of the Court changed during a single government's tenure, how can one know whether the increase in the justices' votes against the government was driven by strategic defection or by the replacement of justices?

Because the composition of the Court remained stable during Alfonsin's government between 1983 and 1989, a compositional explanation for the observed change in voting pattern of the judges is relevant only for the military period. Between 1976 and 1983 there were no fewer than 10 compositions of the Supreme Court (Molinelli, Palanza, and Sin 1999, 703). Of the 12 justices who sat on the bench during this period, only two remained during the entire military regime (Justices Gabrielli and Rossi) and only four sat on the bench during portions of both the pretransitional and the transitional periods (Justices Gabrielli, Rossi, Guastavino, and Black).

To deal with the possibility that only later appointees ruled against the government, I reestimated several of the previous models to examine the impact of timing and case importance only for the subset of the four justices who served during both periods. Similar to the findings for the full set of judges' decisions, the coefficients for each of the final 24 months timing variables are statistically significant, with the subset of justices increasing their antigovernment decisions in the last two years of the military government by 41 percentage points in decree cases, by 39 percentage points in the salient decree cases, by 21 percentage points in government appeals cases, and by 11 percentage points in overturning cases (see Table 4). These results suggest that the increase in antigovernment decisions cannot be explained away by the changing composition of the Court at the end of the dictatorship.<sup>22</sup>

Mix of Cases. The second set of alternative explanations is that the increase in antigovernment decisions at the end of weak governments was driven by changes in the types of cases coming before the court. One plausible alternative hypothesis is that if governments acted less legally at the end of their terms, then the increased rulings against the government might be due to changes in the cases themselves, not strategic defection. While plausible, this interpretation does not square fully with what is known about the actions of recent Argentine governments. For example, it is highly dubious whether increasing illegality explains the actions of the Court at the end of the military period. Cases involving the most egregious violations of human and civil rights began coming to the Court immediately after the military seized power.<sup>23</sup> Thus, what changed was not the legality of these cases but, rather, the decisions of the iustices.

To test this claim, I isolated the cases that involved writs of habeas corpus filed on behalf of prisoners detained or "disappeared" by the military and estimated a separate logit model (not shown here) with a constant, final 24 months, habeas, and an interaction term, final 24 months \* habeas. Consistent with a strategic interpretation, the coefficient for the interaction term is negative and significant at the  $p \le 0.05$  level, but the coefficient for the habeas term is indistinguishable from zero. In other words, in nontransitional periods habeas cases were no more or less likely than all other types of cases to be decided against the government, but in transition periods they were more likely to be decided against the government. Thus, the judges' willingness to decide against the government in habeas corpus cases coincided not with a change in the legality of the cases per se, but with the unraveling of the military dictatorship.

A somewhat different alternative explanation posits that regardless of the legality of the government's actions, the mix of cases coming before the Court may have included more that were likely to be decided against the government. To examine this possibility, I ran logistic regressions for each of the first two final 24-month transitional periods with all of the 19 issue variables contained in the database.<sup>24</sup> The results in Table 5 suggest that a change in the mix of cases does not erase the timing effect predicted by the theory of strategic defection. Consistent with the strategic argument, Model 31 shows that during the first transitional period under the military, controlling for the issue categories has virtually no effect. The coefficient for the final 24 months under the military (-0.83) remains negative and significant at the  $p \le 0.001$  level.

For the second final 24-month transitional period Model 32 shows that cases involving several types of issues (armed forces retire, customs, emergency, federal, procedures, and public administration hiring/firing) were significantly more likely to be decided against the government.<sup>25</sup> Thus, I constructed a new dummy variable (Issue Group), which subsumes all of the issues with negative and significant coefficients. Inconsistent with the alternative explanation, however, the coefficient from the second timing variable (-0.31) remains negative and significant at the  $p \le 0.05$  level. Although less impressive than the findings for the first transition, the data show that when controls for cases of a type more likely to be decided against the government were introduced, the justices still increased their decisions against the government during the second transition period by a margin of six percentage points.

CONCLUSION

Scholars have long assumed that only judges free of political pressure and manipulation are capable of ruling against the government. In many parts of the world, this explains why judges who lack institutional security support incumbent governments but not why they also make decisions that go against the government. I have argued instead that under certain conditions institutional insecurity may be the very reason why judges rule against the rulers. Once the incumbent government begins to lose power, judges who lack institutional security face incentives to distance themselves from the outgoing government by ruling against it, engaging in strategic defection. The results reported here strongly support the strategic defection account: Under both dictatorship and democracy Argentine judges tended likely to vote against the military than earlier appointees. <sup>23</sup> During the military period 4% of cases dealt with writs of habeas corpus. Among the leading human rights cases under the military were Ercoli (1976), Lokman (1977), Pérez de Smith (1977), Timerman (1978, 1979), and Zamorano (1977) (Carrió 1996).

to support governments when governments were strong and to desert them when they grew weak.

Several broader implications emerge from examining judicial behavior under institutional insecurity. The analysis not only reveals that there is more than one way in which checks and balances can emerge, but also suggests that the nature of checks and balances may differe depending on whether they are induced by secure or insecure tenure. Students of the U.S. Supreme Court have long observed that secure tenure tends to produce judges who are backward-looking or conservative (Dahl 1957). A major area of debate among scholars of the U.S. judiciary is whether courts can be at the forefront of social change (McCann 1994; Rosenberg 1991; Schultz 1998). Although much work remains to be done on the relationship between civil society and courts beyond the United States, this analysis suggests a new mechanism by which even a Court that lacks basic institutional security may become forward-looking and even progressive, depending, of course, on the nature of the incoming government. Under such conditions, it may be that social movements should choose a legal course of action, if only to speed up or reinforce an expected policy shift in that direction. This may explain why, despite the overall lack of confidence in the independence of the judiciary, many social movements in Argentina have sought redress through the courts (Brysk 1994).

The flip side of insecure tenure, however, is that when the incumbent government is secure the court is completely captured. This may be good news to some democratic critics of the court who argue that judges should not be allowed to overrule the will of the people, but it is more problematic in a context where elected representatives do not necessarily respect that will. Under conditions of insecure tenure, judges are continually and directly affected by politics. If one thinks of judges as part legalist, part politician, then under conditions of insecure tenure the latter role tends to dominate the former. Thus, in addition to suffering from the same institutional deficits as their tenured counterparts (i.e., having neither the purse nor the sword), the legitimacy of judges is compromised by their subservience to the government of the day. Moreover, when political influence is limited to selection, the question remains whether judges will actually prove loyal. Politicians may fail to anticipate all issues that will come before the court, or judges may turn out differently than expected. The possibility that judges will eventually be able to operate independently of political considerations is absent under conditions of insecure tenure, where the mechanisms of control and influence are contemporaneous and thus comparatively more effective.

The foregoing analysis does not imply that insecure judicial tenure automatically increases the power of all political actors. It does not. Notably, the power of executives does not uniformly increase where institutional insecurity obtains. On the contrary, insecure tenure may be one of the very mechanisms by which presidential power is reduced: Just when executives are most in need of a loyal court, they are least likely to get one. That Latin American presidents are not all-powerful is familiar to scholars of presidentialism (Shugart and Carey 1992). Strategic defection provides a new twist on this phenomenon by explaining why even the most loyal supporters of presidents turn against them once they begin to lose power. Moreover, to the extent that institutional insecurity obtains more broadly, the analysis reported here establishes a new agenda for explaining the behavior of various other institutional actors who may face similar incentives to defect strategically from weak presidents, such as legislators, bureaucrats, and nonindependent central bankers.

Finally, with respect to broader questions about democratic consolidation and the rule of law, strategic defection offers no panacea. Strategic defection may lead to progressive decisions in some contexts, but so too might things work in the other direction. The character of decisions depends not on the judges' sincere reading of the law, but on their ability to adjust their interpretation of the law in light of the values and preferences of the incoming government. Thus, even though judges challenge governments, as long as insecure tenure obtains and judges are forced to take into account political actors' views, the rule of law will continue to prove elusive.

APPENDIX

The issue variables are coded as follows. Military (hiring/ firing) = 1 when the case involved the hiring or firing of military personnel. Military (other) = 1 when the case involved any military issue that is not hiring or firing. Amparo = 1 when a case involved an injunction against the government (referred to in Latin American law as a writ of amparo). Monetary claims = 1 when the case involved monetary claims made by or against the state. Constitutional issues = 1 when the case involved a federal or provincial constitutional question. Customs = 1 when the case involved customs claims. Emergency powers = 1 when the case involved the emergency powers of the executive contained in Article 23 of the 1853 Constitution. Federal-provincial = 1 when the case involved a dispute between the federal and the provincial governments. Federal (other) = 1 when the case involved a federal question not subsumed by the other variables. Habeas corpus = 1 when a case involved a writ of habeas corpus. Interpretation = 1 when the case involved a federal statutory interpretation. Judiciary = 1 when the case involved judicial salaries, hiring and firing, or promotion. Jurisdiction = 1 when a case involved a question of jurisdiction. Procedures = 1 when the case involved criminal procedures and due process. Property = 1 when the case involved private property. Public employees (hiring/firing) = 1 when the case involved the hiring or firing of any nonmilitary public employee. Public employees (other) = 1 when the case involved any nonmilitary public employee and was not about hiring or firing. Taxes = 1 when the case involved federal taxes.

Jurisprudential Regimes in Supreme Court Decision Making

MARK J. RICHARDS Grand Valley State University HERBERT M. KRITZER University of Wisconsin—Madison

Te theorize that if law matters in Supreme Court decision making, it matters not as a mechanistic force that dictates decisions, but as an institutional construct created by justices who possess political attitudes. Jurisprudential regimes identify relevant case factors and/or set the level of scrutiny or balancing the justices will use. These jurisprudential regimes have the potential to make a significant difference in the decisions of the justices. We identify a candidate jurisprudential regime, content-neutrality, which appears to govern the general area of free expression law. The Court applies the strictest standard of review to regulations of expression that target the content or viewpoint of expression. Relying on a series of statistical tests using logistic regression, we find that the justices take seriously this jurisprudential regime.

oes law influence the justices of the U.S. Supreme Court as they decide cases? Some leading scholars of the Supreme Court assert that law makes little difference. According to the most extreme version of this position, justices largely follow their personal ideological preferences—a view that the Supreme Court itself did much to enhance in Bush v. Gore (2000). If this is true, then the Supreme Court differs from a small legislative body only in the selection and tenure of its members, its technical rules of procedure, and its inability, at least formally, to initiate issues to consider. Whether or not courts generally, and the Supreme Court specifically, differ from legislative bodies has major implications for how we think about the role of courts and analyze their processes and outputs.

We contend that courts, including the Supreme Court, are different, and that part of this difference is the role of law in decision making. In this article, we describe and test a new approach to incorporating law into statistical models of Supreme Court decision making. At the same time, we do not reject the importance, or even the dominance, of attitudinal influences on the Court's decisions. However, we argue that one must move beyond the images of the role of law as a mechanistic, autonomous force to arrive at a legal model that is relevant at the Supreme Court level.

Segal and Spaeth (1993, 1994; Spaeth and Segal 1999), the leading proponents of the attitudinal model of Supreme Court decision making, argue that justices of the Court are free to decide cases solely in line with their policy (attitudinal) preferences and almost always do so decide. According to this interpretation the justices' freedom to pursue their own policy goals is due to their specific institutional situation: They possess life tenure, sit at the pinnacle of the judicial hierarchy, seldom have ambition for higher office, choose which cases they will decide, and have little fear of being overturned by the elected branches of government, particularly in constitutional interpretation cases (Spaeth and Segal 1999). We do not dispute that the Supreme Court's institutional setting frees justices from the kinds of constraints that are faced by lower court judges, elected officeholders, or appointees serving either fixed terms of office or at the pleasure of some other officeholder. However, freedom from review or electoral accountability does not prevent the justices themselves from erecting other constraints that shape their decision-making processes and/or outcomes (Gillman 2001; Knight and Epstein 1996).

Almost 40 years ago, Martin Shapiro proposed "political jurisprudence" as an organizing principle for the study of courts and judicial decision making. By combining "political" and "jurisprudence" Shapiro (1964, 1968) sought to convey both that courts must be understood as part of the political and governmental structure and that courts differ from other political institutions because of their unique relationship to law. Scholars have marshaled impressive evidence that the justices and lower court judges seek to advance their own policy preferences (Cross and Tiller 1998; Segal and Spaeth 1993) and that the justices are sensitive to both internal and external strategic concerns (Epstein and Knight 1998; Wahlbeck, Spriggs, and Maltzman 1998). Largely lost in these developments is the other half of Shapiro's concept: jurisprudence. Judges and justices are undoubtedly political, but are they also jurisprudential? Courts and judges are certainly part of the political world, but they are also part of a distinctive legal culture (Grossman et al. 1982).

We look for the influence of law in the form of "jurisprudential regimes." Jurisprudential regimes structure Supreme Court decision making by establishing which case factors are relevant for decision making and/or by setting the level of scrutiny or balancing the justices are to employ in assessing case factors (i.e., weighting the influence of various factors). Justices then apply regimes in subsequent pertinent cases. After a new regime is established, we expect case factors to matter to the justices in a manner distinct from their influence in cases decided prior to the establishment of the regime. Leaving jurisprudence out of the analytic framework fails to recognize both the distinctive nature of courts and the theoretical point that ideas and institutions matter. Ideas can take on a life of their own and become institutionalized because they serve to frame how people think about political issues, how they evaluate the actions of others, and how they try to persuade others to their own perspective.

MECHANISTIC LAW OR LAW AS INSTITUTIONAL CONSTRUCT?

Segal and Spaeth (see also Brenner and Spaeth 1995) rely upon an extreme model of legal constraint. In their most extensive writing on the subject, they limit their focus to precedent and measure the influence of law in terms of justices' willingness to defer to precedent when it directly conflicts with their policy preferences (Segal and Spaeth 1996; Spaeth and Segal 1999). Elsewhere, their discussions of the influence of law are similarly mechanistic, focusing on either the "plain meaning" of statutes or the "intention" of the legal drafters (Segal and Spaeth 1993, 33–53).

Earlier political scientists saw law's influence in a more nuanced way. As Shapiro (1968, 71) observed, [Even if] stare decisis does not dictate automatic results,... [that] does not mean that legal decision making is a form of free play in which every judge can do exactly what he pleases.... [H]e is constrained by the previous state of the law insofar as it is clear. Because it is never entirely clear he always has some discretion. And he is likely to find the law less and less clear and exercise more and more discretion as he finds that the old law is giving the bad results.

Nor does Segal and Spaeth's characterization of the role of law bear much relationship to the way in which legal scholars consider the impact of Supreme Court decisions. Typically these scholars do not talk about the Court creating precedents that define or predict outcomes of future Supreme Court cases. Rather, scholars ranging from Tribe (1988) to Posner (1987) focus on how the decision structures created by the justices will affect future decisions, both at the Supreme Court level and in the courts below. Central to these discussions are the categories and levels of scrutiny or balancing that should guide decisions: "compelling interest," "market participant," "incitement of imminent illegal action," "strict scrutiny," and "undue burden." These are important because of the Court's institutional role in the polity. As appointed members of a branch of government that lacks the electoral support of other democratically elected political actors, the justices must provide reasons for their decisions. They employ the concepts of legal categories and levels of scrutiny to explain and justify their decisions (Carter 1994).

Political scientists of the institutionalist school recognize that the Supreme Court is centrally a political institution interacting with other institutions. Those other institutions seek to anticipate the Court's action, either by trying to predict based solely upon the justices' policy preferences or by also understanding the analytic framework the Court is applying. While in some areas such as capital punishment, prediction based solely on justices' preferences as illuminated by key leading cases might be most efficacious, in many areas patterns and categories of analysis described by the justices must be combined with the justices' preferences (Shapiro 1964, 40-3). For example, if the Court is applying a "rational basis test," the other political actors understand that the Court will likely defer to other political decision makers. One can argue that the Court's decision to apply such a deferential standard is a reflection of policy preferences, but there are other basic explanations, such as justices' recognition of the Court's institutional role within the larger governmental structure (Sunstein 1999), the problematic nature of some areas of law for ongoing judicial scrutiny (Shapiro 1964), and the body of practice that provides the foundation for law generally and the Court more specifically (Brigham 1999).

Thus, the central role of law in Supreme Court decision making is not to be found in precedents that predict how justices will vote in future cases. Rather, law at the Supreme Court level is to be found in the structures the justices create to guide future decision making: their own, that of lower courts, and that of nonjudicial political actors. Shapiro (1968, 39) stated this succinctly: "[T]he opinions themselves, not who won or lost, are the crucial form of political behavior by the appellate courts, since it is the opinions which provide the constraining directions to the public and private decision makers who determine the 99 percent of conduct that never reaches the courts." As they write the opinions that justify their decisions, judges and justices do not mechanistically follow rules. Rather, they engage in case analysis—the process of analogical reasoning that involves parsing the issues in a case and referring to prior cases for guidance on acceptable alternatives. Sunstein (1999, 43) argues that case analysis allows judges flexibility but does not lead to unconstrained decision making. Precedents remove "certain arguments from the legal repertoire [which] simplifies analysis.... Most of the important constraints on judicial discretion [in interpreting the Constitution] come not from constitutional text or history, but from the process of grappling with previous decisions" (Sunstein 1999, 42).

Advocates of the attitudinal model point out that the justices create the law that guides their own decision making, so the law is itself a reflection of the justices' attitudes. We do not deny this. However, as others writing in an institutional vein have argued (see, e.g., McCann 1999), this begs the question. With the exception of the strict natural law perspective, all jurisprudential understandings of law see it as a human construct, including theories ranging from originalism (Scalia 1997) to positivism (Hart 1961) to political and normative interpretations of law (Dworkin 1996). That is, law, as a "cognitive structure" (Smith 1988, 91), is itself a political institution, created by men and women to impose constraints on themselves and others. As Brigham (1999, 20) observes, "Institutions share a capacity to order social life because people act as if they exist, as if they matter." Thus, as with other humanmade institutions, law is created to serve a purpose, and people go along with the institution if they see its purpose as worthwhile or if they are otherwise constrained by the institution. If the adherents of a pure attitudinal model wish to reduce law to nothing more than attitudes formally stated, the attitudinal model becomes tautological; attitudes drive decisions because every decision is made on the basis of attitudes. Our position is that attitudes influence the development of law, but law can also affect the decisions of the Court, and these effects are not purely attitudinal.

Law can be changed if the views of those charged with creating it change. This potential for change is true of all human-created institutions, but institutions differ in the ability of those possessing the power of change to make actual changes. The Supreme Court may have more freedom to make changes than many other institutions, but that does not mean that members of the Court persistently fail to abide by the institutional structures that define the Court's role and its range of potential action and decision making. This point reflects the fundamental insight of neoinstitutionalism: Political actors create institutions based on their policy goals, but those institutions then structure and constrain the behavior of the very political actors who created them.

WHY DO JUSTICES USE THE LAW?

As we have argued, justices see the law that they make as providing guidance to other institutions in society. For that guidance to be effective, they must rely upon that same law as guidance to themselves in order to treat like cases consistently. The justices commonly hold consistent treatment of like cases as a goal, although they may differ in their individual treatment of this goal. They attempt to make their decision fit within the relevant analytic framework. They can generalize from the particular factors of the case at hand to the more general, consistent analytic framework that has applied to similar cases. Justices want to treat like cases alike based not simply on the results of previous cases, but on the principles that justify those results. Thus Dworkin (1978, 113) suggests that the "gravitational force" of precedent is explained by the "fairness of treating like cases alike." The justices are engaged in a process of reasoning about their judgments. As they do so, they make arguments that are based on more than personal policy preferences. They strive to reason in a generalizable manner that takes into account the points of view of other justices and other political actors, as well as their own views. They must reason in a way that makes sense to others; they cannot merely offer reflexive, first-personal rationalizations of their decisions (Nagel 1997). They engage in bargaining and accommodation with respect to the content of opinions, so the reasons they offer in opinions matter to the other justices (Wahlbeck, Spriggs, and Maltzman 1998). Appeals to law are means of achieving this goal. An additional reason for following the law is that competency in the language of the law is a prerequisite for making plausible arguments (Brigham 1978).

Because the justices use law to decide new cases that almost invariably differ from prior cases, they need to think of law as defining and refining decision structures rather than as creating rules in the form of "if X, then decide Y." In its simplest form, a decision structure could be expressed as a regression-like equation:

Decide Y if
$$(b_1X_1 + b_2X_2 + b_3X_3 + \text{etc.}) > k$$

where this reads, decide Y if the weighted combination of factors 1, 2, 3, etc., exceeds some threshold. The decision structure is the definition of the relevant factors (Xs), how they should be weighted (bs), and whether they exceed the threshold. For example, whereas the attitudinalist view of the analysis in Shaw v. Reno (1993) would be that it was only a rationalization for the conservative preferences of the majority, Bybee (1999, 221) argues that Shaw "did not merely provide a rationalization for political opposition to race-conscious redistricting." Rather, Shaw "offered a new set of terms in which the problem of minority representation could be understood. The resulting framework made a difference in how representative institutions were conceptualized and structured." More importantly, the framework guides not only those drawing district lines, but also the courts, including the Supreme Court itself, in assessing the constitutionality of districting plans.

Decision structures reflect the attitudes of the justices who create them and can be changed by justices who find them problematic, but they also structure how justices go about deciding cases even if they do not directly constrain the votes of justices. Decision structures reflect core understandings of the bases on which cases should be decided, the interests or goals to which deference should be shown in situations of conflict, and the relevant roles of governmental institutions. A broad concept that captures the role of decision structures and the idea that they change is that of "regime," or as we label it for our purpose, "jurisprudential regime." 1

JURISPRUDENTIAL REGIMES

The Concept of Regime

In common parlance, the term "regime" is typically associated with a particular governing elite or, possibly, with a particular system of rule or government. Political scientists, in contrast, normally use the term in connection with institutional forms.

For example, in the literature of American political development, a regime defines a period marked by a combination of political content and the particular ways in which federalism and separation of powers operate in practice (Orren and Skowronek 1998–99, 690).

&lt;sup>1</sup> In previous papers, we have employed the label "legal regime" rather than "jurisprudential regime." "Legal regime" has been widely used, with varying implied or explicit definitions; our search of the Westlaw journals and law review database produced more than 6,000 hits on the term "legal regime." The term "jurisprudential regime" has a much narrower (and less frequent—only 15 hits in the Westlaw database) usage.

It is the regime that "infus[es] institutions with meaning, purpose, and direction" (Orren and Skowronek 1998–99, 694), reflecting a combination of intellectual, political, and institutional forces (Polsky 1997, 153–4). More specifically, in recent work on the New Deal period,

Political regimes... appear as working arrangements among institutions fashioned by new governing cadres to elaborate their particular political commitments. As regimes transform new ideas about the purposes of government into governing routines, they carry on the reformer's central contention as the political common sense of a new era, a set of base assumptions shared (or at least accepted) by all the major actors in this period. In this way, political regimes come to exercise an overarching influence over the affairs of state. (Orren and Skowronek 1998–99, 694)

Such regimes are not mechanistic forces. This neoinstitutional conceptualization of regimes integrates human agency with institutional explanations. Individuals create regimes, and regimes are vulnerable to changes at both the elite and the mass level.

Some scholars focusing on U.S. constitutional history have explicitly or implicitly applied a construct of regime to understanding broad patterns of Supreme Court decisions. Ackerman (1991, 59), for example, explores "constitutional regimes:" the matrix of institutional relationships and fundamental values that are usually taken as the constitutional baseline in normal political life. He argues that American history has been marked by three distinct constitutional regimes: the initial founding regime; the "Middle Regime," which began with Reconstruction; and the "Modern Regime," which began with the "switch in time that saved nine" in the 1930s and was epitomized by footnote 4 in U.S. v. Carolene Products (1938). This and other work makes it clear that the Court not only functions within constitutional regimes but also is central in creating those regimes (see, e.g., Smith 1997 and Whittington 1999). Similarly, Clayton and May (1999, 234) have called for application of the neoinstitutional concept of "political regimes" to the study of legal decision making. "The approach suggests that judicial attitudes and strategies in decision making are both constrained and constituted by the broader context within which the Court operates."

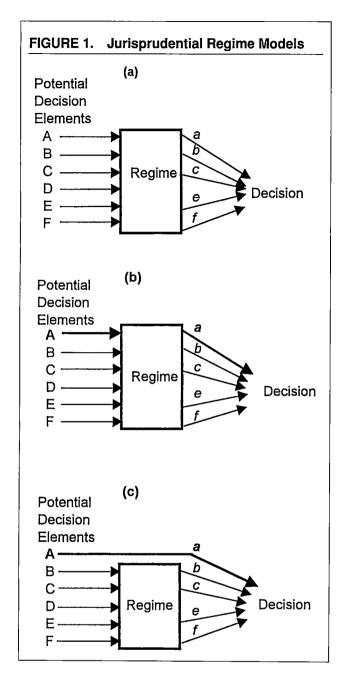

The regime concept is also used extensively in the literature of international relations (Krasner 1983a; Hasenclever, Mayer, and Rittberger 1997). In that context, regime, or more specifically "international regime," is customarily defined as "principles, norms, rules, and decision making procedures around which actor expectations converge in a given issue area" (Krasner 1983b, 2). The core argument of international regime theory scholars is that nations must consider both policy goals and the regimes that govern particular sets of issues. Decision makers take into account national interest and national power in dealing with issues, but also assess the principles, norms, rules, and procedures that govern decision making on those issues. In the absence of anything like a regime, nations would simply pursue their own interests in whatever way each believed appropriate. Furthermore, regimes are established by the states, particularly the more powerful states, which are then constrained by those very same regimes; the effect of the regimes is to overcome what would otherwise be major coordination problems (Young 1983).

Conceptualizing Jurisprudential Regimes

In defining the concept of jurisprudential regime, we step down one level from the broad notions of constitutional and political regimes used by Ackerman and by Clayton and May. Whereas constitutional and political regimes define expansive patterns of decision making and institutional interrelationships, jurisprudential regimes focus on more specific areas of Supreme Court activity. We draw upon one standard definition of jurisprudence: "a system or body of law; especially a body of law dealing with a specific issue or area" (Merriam-Webster's Dictionary of Law 1996). Specifically, we conceptualize a jurisprudential regime referring to a key precedent, or a set of related precedents, that structures the way in which the Supreme Court justices evaluate key elements of cases in arriving at decisions in a particular legal area. The decisions enunciating these key precedents serve to demarcate jurisprudential regimes that are established for a particular period of time. Fundamentally, jurisprudential regimes function as intervening variables between factors influencing justices' decisions and the decisions themselves, much as international regimes function as intervening variables in the actions of nation-state actors (see Krasner 1983b).

The construct of jurisprudential regime fits squarely within the neoinstitutionalist perspective on politics generally and within recent institutionalist approaches to the study of the Supreme Court (see Clayton and Gillman 1999 and Epstein and Knight 1998). A jurisprudential regime is a social institution in the sense that law more generally is a human construct. As such, jurisprudential regimes rely upon, even as they structure, the actions of the legal decision makers. There is nothing about a jurisprudential regime that prevents a justice from ignoring it if the justice is so motivated. That is, unlike the physical law of action-reaction governing physical machines (i.e., an action mandates a reaction), human decision making generally, and legal decision making specifically, can and often does deviate from social and institutional constraints. This is why attitudes matter. However, justices need something like jurisprudential regimes to overcome what might otherwise be major coordination problems if each justice simply sought to advance his or her own policy preferences. Thus, law can be thought of as serving this coordination function, while at the same time the justices are deciding cases based primarily, but not solely, on their own policy goals.

Figure 1 represents jurisprudential regimes graphically. A justice's decision involves inputs that we label "potential decision elements;" these include policy attitudes, factual elements, and strategic implications for other actors. One can think of these potential decision elements as unweighted as they are initially identified and defined. In Figure 1, the unweighted nature of the potential decision elements is indicated by the absence of any coefficients in the arrows going into the jurisprudential regime. Figure 1a shows the jurisprudential regime filtering these potential decision elements and transforming them into actual decision elements carrying some specific weight in influencing the justice's vote. In the end, not all potential decision elements actually affect the decision; this is indicated by the absence of one possible arrow emerging from the jurisprudential regime. That is, some of the potential decision elements do not emerge from the regime because they are deemed irrelevant. The weighting of the elements by the jurisprudential regime is reflected in the coefficients (italicized lowercase letters) attached to each of the arrows leading finally to the decision. (The missing arrow could also be thought of as having a coefficient equal to zero.) If one were to place two jurisprudential regimes for a given area of decision making side by side, they would differ in which arrows emerged out of the regimes and/or in the weights associated with each.

We do not in any way reject the possibility that justices are influenced significantly, perhaps even primarily, by attitudes. For example, potential decision element A in Figure 1 could well be the justice's attitude, and one could redraw the model so that it emphasizes the heavy contribution of that element (as in Figure 1b). Furthermore, there is nothing that necessarily restricts the potential decision elements. whether or not attitudinal, to policy questions (e.g., criminal justice, economic policy, civil liberties policy). The factors might include "legal policy" goals (Baum 1997, 4) and "role attitudes" (Gibson 1978). Nor is anything in this framework inconsistent with the view that justices are constrained by institutional and strategic concerns such as the need to obtain agreement from four additional colleagues to secure a majority in favor of the justice's position (Epstein and Knight 1998; Murphy 1964) or the desire to avoid overturning of decisions by acts of Congress (Marks 1989; but see Segal 1997). While Figures 1a and b have all potential decision elements filtered through the jurisprudential regime, this need not be the case. Some potential decision elements might influence the decision directly, without any mediation by the jurisprudential regime. Judicial attitudes might be one such element; the position of the Solicitor General as a party or amicus might be another. Figure 1c shows a further modification of the jurisprudential regime model that allows for decision elements unmediated by the jurisprudential regime.

The key to validating the existence of jurisprudential regimes is change by the Supreme Court in basic factors associated with decision making in a particular legal area. Typically such changes become the focus of discussion in commentary on the Court's decisions, and one can rely upon such commentary to identify "candidate regimes" (i.e., hypotheses about precedents constituting regimes for certain periods). One can then use these candidate regimes to test whether the kinds of changes in decision making the regimes model would lead one to expect do happen. Such tests should be straightforward: The influences of case elements on the justices' decisions should vary across regimes, and the factors influencing justices' decisions should change consistently with regime breaks.

What the regimes approach allows that other institutionalist approaches have not succeeded in doing is incorporating a role for law in testable models of the justices' votes. This is not to suggest by any means that institutionalist analyses have neglected the role of law; quite the opposite is the case, as reflected in work such as that by Gillman (1993) and Smith (1988). However, attitudinalists would likely dismiss this work as lacking rigor. And as Segal and Spaeth (1993) point out, even statistical models of Supreme Court decision making that have utilized case characteristics that might be deemed to have a legal basis to predict Supreme Court decision making (see George and Epstein 1992 and Segal 1984) are not satisfactory. Such variables are not unambiguously legal; they may also matter for attitudinal reasons. For example, George and Epstein (1992) find that Supreme Court justices' votes in capital punishment cases are shaped in part by the case characteristic of whether the punishment is proportional to the crime, a characteristic based on Supreme Court precedent. However, a justice's attitudinal disposition could also influence whether this factor mattered. With the exception of some work on the U.S. Courts of Appeals (Songer and Haire 1992) and state supreme courts (Traut and Emmert 1998), scholars have failed to assess how precedents can condition the influence of case characteristics over time; our approach is able to overcome the shortcomings of prior case characteristic or fact pattern analyses of the Supreme Court by doing iust this.

OPERATIONALIZING JURISPRUDENTIAL REGIMES

Freedom of expression law is an area where the justices have established a coherent legal framework for decision making, and this is the area in which we test our theory.

Why Select Freedom of Expression Cases?

Free expression cases constitute a fair test of jurisprudential regimes for several reasons. Free expression law is an area that allows room for attitudes to operate. The great diversity of speaker identities in free expression cases increases the potential for the attitudes of particular justices to matter. Free expression law covers criminal, civil, labor, and regulatory law. It also covers private suits, government denials of benefits or opportunities to speak, and cases where the government fires employees or disciplines lawyers. This breadth of cases avoids the problem of testing only criminal cases, for example. Limiting analysis to one type of cases may skew the likelihood that the justices vote consistently with a legal or attitudinal explanation.

The trend toward a more conservative Court membership begins around the time that the speech-protective (i.e., liberal) content-neutrality regime was established in the 1972 companion cases Chicago Police Department v. Mosley and Grayned v. Rockford. Testing a liberal regime that is instituted as the Court is becoming more conservative provides an even more challenging test for regime theory than if we were to test a conservative regime established at this time.

Identifying Content-Neutrality as a Candidate Regime

To identify a candidate jurisprudential regime for freedom of expression law, we looked for key precedents that established which case factors are relevant for free expression decision making and/or set the level of scrutiny or balancing that the justices are to employ in assessing those case factors.<sup>2</sup> The relevant case factors frequently require interpretation; Grayned and Mosley ask whether the law at issue regulates the content of expression.<sup>3</sup> The separate question of whether the regime was influential, rather than merely the subject of scholarly commentary, we sought to answer through statistical analysis. We also required that the candidate regime should have been adopted by at least a five-member majority of the Court.4 To help identify candidate regimes, we relied on four constitutional casebooks with a variety of political perspectives (Kmiec and Presser 1998; Shiffrin and Choper 1996; Smolla 1994; Tribe 1988) that cover free expression law in detail. Such commentary is particularly useful because it is external to the Court. All four recognized the content-neutrality jurisprudence as identifying relevant case factors and setting the level of scrutiny in free expression law, and three of the four casebooks specifically linked Grayned and/or Mosley to the contentneutrality regime.

Thus, we hypothesize that the jurisprudential regime that currently applies to most cases that raise a free expression claim is based on the principle of contentneutrality. Tribe's (1988) two-track interpretation of the general free expression regime suggests that the Court asks whether the regulation in question is content-based (aimed at the communicative impact or viewpoint of the expression) or content-neutral. According to the Court, content-based regulations merit the most rigorous scrutiny and are unlikely to be sustained, because they are at odds with a core principle of the First Amendment as it pertains to freedom of expression. Content-based, or track one, regulations are subject to strict scrutiny: they must be narrowly tailored to serve a compelling government interest. A challenged regulation is not narrowly tailored if the government could have used a less restrictive regulation that would have achieved the government interest. Expression governed by content-neutral (track two) incidental, time, place, or manner regulations receives less constitutional protection.<sup>5</sup> These regulations are assessed according to intermediate scrutiny: They must be narrowly tailored to serve significant government

Supreme Court decision making.

As an initial step, we traced the evolution of a potential regime back to the earliest precedent in which the regime received the support of five justices. This involved immersion in the casebooks written by scholars in the free expression area to get a sense of the content of the regime and the names of key cases that follow it. We then used Findlaw's collection of Supreme Court case law with hyperlinked citations (Findlaw.com 2001) to trace the evolution of the regime backward in time to the foundational precedent.

interests. This standard of review is quite protective of expression, but not as protective as the track one standard. The Court formally established the two-track regime in the Mosley and Grayned 1972 companion cases, striking down attempts to prohibit all picketing outside of schools except for labor picketing as content-based regulations that were not narrowly tailored. However, the Court also upheld a regulation of noisy picketing outside of schools during school hours as narrowly tailored and content-neutral. The vote in each case was nine-zero, with three concurring votes.

Identifying which cases are the regime-defining cases is a fairly interpretive process. To give readers a better sense of how we identify the cases that define the start of the regime, we engage in the following discussion of why these cases stand out from other ones. In several important decisions prior to Mosley and Grayned the Court started to use the categories and concepts that it developed more fully in Mosley and Grayned. As early as 1941, in Cox v. New Hampshire, the Court mentioned the time, place, and manner categories. At that point, however, those categories were not clearly linked to a standard of review. In N.A.A.C.P. v. Button (1963), the Court applied a stringent standard of review to laws that abridged the First Amendment, requiring that such laws be justified by a compelling government interest and be written precisely to minimize intrusion upon First Amendment freedoms. However, the Court did not elaborate whether content-neutral regulations should be treated differently. In the first of two Cox v. Louisiana (1965a) decisions, the Court overturned a civil rights leader's convictions for disturbing the peace and obstructing a public passageway, because those convictions discriminated against him based on the content of his expression. However, the Court did not apply a standard of review. In the second Cox v. Louisiana (1965b) decision, announced the same day, the Court rejected the argument that a law that prohibits picketing near courthouses is unconstitutional on its face. Although this case would have been a suitable vehicle for explaining the different treatment of a contentneutral place regulation compared to a content-based regulation, the Court did not use it as such.

Not until the Mosley and Grayned decisions did the Court more fully develop the content-neutrality regime. Several key points emerged from Mosley and Grayned. First, a regulation that appears to be a time, place, or manner regulation is not necessarily contentneutral, such as the ordinance banning all protests except labor protests outside schools; the Court will scrutinize time, place, and manner regulations to be certain that they are content-neutral. Second, contentbased restrictions of expression are more likely to be unconstitutional than content-neutral regulations. Finally, even if the state regulates in a content-neutral manner, it must also do so in a precise manner, so that the regulation does not restrict more speech than is necessary to achieve the government interest. We hypothesize that after the Grayned regime was established, expression that is governed by both content-based and content-neutral laws was more protected than before, although expression regulated in a content-neutral manner should not have been as well protected as expression restricted by content-based regulations.

There are two important exceptions to the two-track regime. First, cases must meet the threshold of First Amendment protection. Cases in which free expression is not abridged or there is no government action do not invoke the protection of the First Amendment. The other exception is that certain regulations of expression receive less rigorous scrutiny because the Court has recognized specific justifications for regulating these types of expression that limit the applicability of the twotrack regime.<sup>6</sup> These less protected categories include commercial speech (Central Hudson Gas & Electric Corp. v. Public Service Commission 1980), obscenity (Miller v. California 1973), broadcast media expression (Federal Communications Commission v. League of Women Voters of California 1984), expression in nonpublic forums (Perry Education Assocation v. Perry Local Educators' Association 1983), expression in schools (Hazelwood v. Kuhlmeier 1988), picketing of secondary sites by labor unions (Longshoremen v. Allied International 1982), speech in a private forum against the will of the owner of the property (Hudgens v. National Labor Relations Board 1976), and libel against private figures (Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc. 1974).

Identifying a candidate regime is merely the first step toward assessing the claim that the justices take the regime seriously. To assess whether the regime is influential, we test a series of logistic regression models.

ANALYTIC STRATEGY AND STATISTICAL METHOD

The core hypothesis derived from the jurisprudential regime model is that the factors that influence justices' decisions for a particular area should vary across jurisprudential regimes. The results of statistical models predicting decisions before and after the establishment of a two-track regime should differ in significant and meaningful ways. Testing the two-track regime involved the following steps.

- 1. We first identified and coded, or extracted from existing data sets, the variables that were expected to account for decision making. These variables include the justices' attitudes, the identity of the speaker, the party acting against the speaker, and the type of action taken against the speaker. In addition, jurisprudential factors (jurisprudence) were coded, such as whether the regulation of expression was content-based or content-neutral.
- 2. Next, we estimated statistical models across, before, and after the regime changes and compared the results to ascertain whether they support the core hypothesis. The key statistical test of regime-based change is a variant of the well-known Chow test (Hanushek and Jackson 1977) of differences in regression results across sets of data. Our analysis uses

- logistic regression, and the computation of the test of change is consequently based on features of logistic regression.<sup>7</sup>
- 3. The next step involved estimating additional models to rule out the major alternative explanation, that change over time can be explained entirely by personnel (and hence attitudinal) change (Baum 1992). This involved reestimating the models while limiting the justices included to those who were on the Court at the time of the regime change.
- 4. One important test of our argument is whether the influence of variables specifically associated with the regime ("jurisprudential variables") changes as regimes change. To test for changes in the influence of these variables (content-based, content-neutral, and threshold not met), we estimated a model including all variables plus interaction terms with the regime dummy variable for nonjurisprudential variables; we then added interaction terms for the jurisprudential variables to the model and determined whether these interactions as a set were statistically significant. We then repeated this "jurisprudential variables test" limiting our analysis to those justices on the Court at the time of the hypothesized regime change.
- 5. Finally, we performed a sensitivity analysis by trying alternative annual time breaks. If the chi-square statistic for the regime break was high relative to the other annual breakpoints, we would have strong confirmation of a regime that shaped the influence of the jurisprudential variables. This sensitivity analysis was also reestimated while controlling for change in personnel.

We coded all cases from 1953 to 1998 that presented a free press, free expression, or free speech issue, according to the U.S. Supreme Court Judicial Database (Spaeth 1999) and Westlaw. A case that raised a free expression issue was included even if a majority of the Court failed to decide the free expression issue; otherwise, the Court's refusal to address controversial First Amendment issues could bias the data set to cases for which jurisprudential regimes were more likely to matter. We selected all orally argued cases for which the Court issued written opinions, including per curiam opinions. We excluded cases with tie votes. We mainly used U.S. Supreme Court opinions, but we supplemented these data with lower court opinions in per curiam cases.<sup>8</sup>

MODEL SPECIFICATION AND RESULTS

Our statistical model of the Grayned regime includes five types of variables: the attitudes of the justices, jurisprudential factors, and other factual elements (i.e., the type of action taken against the speaker, the party acting against the speaker, and the identity of the speaker). To address validity and reliability concerns, in Appendix B we provide examples of coding rules and information on intercoder reliability and validity. We include the attitude variable to assess the merits of the dominant explanation of Supreme Court decision making, the attitudinal model. We include four jurisprudential variables that represent the basic parameters of a free expression regime: whether a regulation of expression is content-based, content-neutral, a regulation of a less protected category, or a regulation that does not invoke the protection of the First Amendment due to a lack of state action or because expression is not abridged (threshold not met). We consider the insight of the strategic model that the justices sometimes take into account the preferences of other political institutions. Given the strategic influence of Congress and the Solicitor General, the federal government should generally fare better before the Court than other parties (Epstein and Knight 1998; McGuire 1990). To test this hypothesis, we take into account the party acting against the speaker (e.g., federal government, state government, local government, party involved in education, private party, or other). We also consider the type of action taken against the speaker (e.g., civil action, criminal action, disciplinary action against a lawyer, causing a speaker to lose employment, administrative denial of benefits [deny benefit] or an opportunity for expression [deny expression], or another type of regulation). The justices may be less sympathetic to criminal prosecutions of speakers and denials of opportunities for expression than they would be to taking away government benefits or employment. There are not strong justifications for why these factors would influence the justices, but they are worth evaluating to discount alternative explanations for voting change.

We also include speaker identity variables (e.g., politician, racial minority, alleged communist, military protester, member of business, member of religious group, print media, broadcast media, or other). The policy goals of the justices may influence their attitudes about particular groups of speakers and individual speakers and may influence the willingness of the justices to protect civil liberties.<sup>9</sup>

Table 1 shows results for models involving the votes of all justices in all cases, cases decided before Grayned, and cases decided after Grayned. Table 1 also shows

results for these three models with only the votes of those justices on the Court at the time of Grayned.<sup>11</sup> In all of the models presented in Table 1, including those that control for personnel change, the attitudes of the justices are highly significant. The more liberal a justice is, the more likely he or she was to vote for the rights of speakers.

Our main concern is how the parameters are conditioned by the Grayned regime. 12 For the models that included the votes of all justices, there are significant differences in the influence of both jurisprudential variables and other variables depending on whether the cases were decided before or after Grayned  $(\chi^2 = 124.68, 21 \text{ df}, p < 0.001)$ . To control for personnel changes, we restricted the analysis to justices sitting on the Court at the time of the Grayned decision. The test statistic continues to be consistent with the idea that Grayned is an influential jurisprudential regime  $(\chi^2 = 113.16, 21 \text{ df}, p < 0.001)$ . It is very unlikely that the differences in the before and after models are a result of the change in the membership of the Court. More specifically, the significance and direction of the coefficients of some nonjurisprudential variables change before and after Grayned. <sup>13</sup> For example, racial minorities, alleged communists, and businesses were likely to fare better after Grayned.

In the next step we considered whether Grayned significantly conditioned the influence of the jurisprudential variables. Using the jurisprudential variables test described above, the chi-square (46.71, 3 df) for the interaction of the jurisprudential variables with the Grayned dummy is significant at p < 0.001. Even after controlling for personnel changes, we observe a chi-square (21.82, 3 df) that is significant at p < 0.001. As for the individual jurisprudential variables, one of the most striking results is that the coefficient for content-based regulations is insignificant before and significant after Grayned. This indicates that after the adoption of the speech-protective part of the regime that applies to content-based regulations, the justices were likely to be more supportive of speakers who were regulated based on the content of their speech relative to speakers whose expression fell within the less protected categories.<sup>14</sup> In addition, the content-neutral coefficient is significant before, but insignificant after, Grayned. The speech-protective part of the regime that applies to content-neutral regulations made it harder for the government to regulate such expression after it was adopted and made it less probable that the justices would vote for the government in track two cases. As expected, however, the justices were more likely to uphold content-neutral than content-based regulations. The models that control for change in personnel confirm all of these observations.

Our final step was the sensitivity analysis, which considered the strength of the chi-square statistic in the jurisprudential variables test relative to the chi-squares generated by a series of alternative annual breakpoints before and after the regime breakpoint. 15 The results of the sensitivity analysis are shown in Figure 2. The chisquare associated with the Grayned regime breakpoint is quite high (46.71, 3 df, p < 0.001) and is the fourth highest of 32 splits tested. Although it is not the highest, the chi-squares that are higher than that for Grayned (those associated with the breakpoints for the Court's 1967, 1968, and 1972 terms) are clustered around the time of Grayned, which was decided during the 1971 term. In addition, the general trend in the data provides reasonably strong confirmation that Grayned is an influential regime, as the chi-squares are the highest in the late 1960s and early 1970s and are significantly lower in the early 1960s, late 1970s, and 1980s. Performing the sensitivity analysis based on a model that includes only

<sup>13</sup> Testing for change in populiciparudential factors over time also <sup>13</sup> Testing for change in nonjurisprudential factors over time also enables control for sources of change over time that are alternative explanations for change in the influence of jurisprudential factors.

<sup>15</sup> The jurisprudential variable tests were performed by creating 31 alternative breakpoints designating the Court's 1960–90 terms.

the justices on the Court at the time of the Grayned decision produced very similar results. 16

Overall, these results constitute robust evidence regarding the claim that Grayned is an influential jurisprudential regime. Not only does the content-neutrality regime condition the influence of particular case factors, but also it conditions the influence of specifically jurisprudential factors. In addition, the changes in the influence of jurisprudential variables shaped by whether a case is decided before or after Grayned stand out in comparison to changes generated by a series of alternative annual breakpoints in the data. After controlling for changes in the membership of the Court, the data analysis still confirms that Grayned is an influential regime.

CONCLUSION

The Supreme Court is not simply a small legislature. Law matters in Supreme Court decision making in ways that are specifically jurisprudential. Specifically, jurisprudential regimes structure Supreme Court decision making by establishing which case factors are relevant for decision making and/or by setting the level of scrutiny the justices are to employ in assessing case factors. Our jurisprudential regime construct moves beyond the dominant model of Supreme Court decision making, the attitudinal model, which posits that legal considerations make little difference in the way the justices vote. We theorize and observe that both the justices' policy goals and legal considerations matter in Supreme Court decision making. Although this point may be seen as an unorthodox challenge to the hegemony of the attitudinal model, our approach brings back the "jurisprudence" of Shapiro's pioneering but recently neglected "political jurisprudence" approach. Although Shapiro anticipated the political insights of attitudinal and strategic scholars of judicial politics, he never lost sight of the jurisprudential side of political jurisprudence. Our approach is also consistent with the neoinstitutional insight that political actors create institutions and institutions that in turn structure the actions of political agents. This insight is widely accepted in subfields such as American political development and international relations and is strongly advocated by some students of judicial politics (see the essays in Clayton and Gillman 1999 and Gillman and Clayton 1999). In addition, our findings parallel the conclusions of international regime theory that ideas matter as they become imbedded in institutional frameworks.

 $<sup>^{16}</sup>$  The jurisprudential variables test chi-square for Grayned, 21.82 (3 df, p < 0.001), is again the fourth highest of the 32 chi-squares. The higher chi-squares (1968, 1972, 1973) are again clustered around the time of Grayned. Skeptics may wonder whether these results may still be caused by personnel change because Justices Powell and Rehnquist had so few votes before Grayned. After controlling for this possibility by excluding Powell and Rehnquist as well, the results remain remarkably parallel, with the Grayned chi-square remaining the fourth highest and the higher chi-squares clustering around the time of Grayned.

We contend that the justices must consider both policy goals and jurisprudential regimes; similarly, international regime scholars argue that nations must consider national interest and the principles, norms, rules, and procedures that comprise regimes.

The jurisprudential regime approach not only incorporates the attitudinal insight that the justices' policy goals shape their votes, but also provides a new empirical method for assessing whether law matters. To date, researchers have had difficulty finding statistical support for legal models, due in part to a focus on law as mechanistically dictating outcomes. Another difficulty researchers have faced is that legal variables are not unambiguously legal; such factors may also matter for attitudinal reasons. Our method overcomes these limitations by recognizing that law is a human construct and by looking at variation over time. We test whether the case factors that the justices consider vary significantly after jurisprudential regimes are created and assess the strength of these regime-based changes relative to that of other annual changes in the influence of case factors. We find that the justices take seriously the Grayned content-neutrality jurisprudential regime. The changes that we observe after the regime is established are not due to changes in the membership of the Court and are strong relative to other annual changes.

Attitudinalists may criticize our approach by suggesting that jurisprudential regimes are created on the basis of the justices' attitudes, so regimes are solely attitudinal (although this argument renders the pure attitudinal model tautological). Advocates of the strategic model may claim that jurisprudential regimes are purely strategic; regimes matter because the justices need to persuade their colleagues, and regimes constitute a framework for making persuasive arguments.

These critiques misconstrue our theory. We do not view law as a mechanistic constraint on decision making outcomes. Rather, law is a construct created by justices with political values and policy goals, and jurisprudential regimes matter in part because they constitute means of persuading other justices. We do not contest these insights of the attitudinal and strategic models; rather, we incorporate them. However, reducing decision making to purely attitudinal or strategic factors creates an incomplete explanation of Supreme Court decision making. Decision making involves more than rationalizations of conclusions that are reflexively generated by a justice's policy preferences. Justices share the goal of treating like cases consistently. As the justices reason about how the case at hand fits with the relevant jurisprudential regime, they are able to offer generalizable reasons that make sense to other justices.

We have tested our jurisprudential regime construct in the context of freedom of expression cases. The next step is to extend the analysis to other areas of Supreme Court decision making. Good candidates for analysis include Establishment Clause cases, Free Exercise cases, administrative law cases, confession cases, search and seizure cases, and specific areas of free speech such as obscenity and commercial speech. We do not believe that all substantive policy areas are necessarily suitable because a given policy area may raise very different legal or jurisprudential concerns. Another possible issue for analysis is the question of unanimous versus nonunanimous cases. Can jurisprudential regimes help us understand what leads the justices to unanimous decisions in cases that would, on their face, lead us to expect a divided Court given our understanding of the justices' policy preferences? We do not have an answer to this question, but we believe that further analysis might be fruitful.

Finally, it is interesting to speculate on what might account for regime changes. We can identify at least three possible causes of regime change. First, regime changes may simply reflect changing personnel on the Court; this is something that many observers argue has been taking place in the area of federalism. However, our controls for personnel change rule this out as an explanation of the content-neutrality regime. Second, changes in economic, social, or political conditions challenge the core principles of a regime (Ackerman 1991); essentially, this is the argument that Gillman (1993) advances to account for the demise of the laissezfaire framework that dominated Supreme Court decision making vis-à-vis economic regulation early in the twentieth century. Finally, as with any kind of organizing framework, the anomalies and contradictions of a regime may become increasingly apprent, leading the justices to seek out a different approach to dealing with cases in a given area (compare to Kuhn 1963); Miller might be seen as representing such a shift in the area of pornography, and much of the dissatisfaction over the so-called Lemon test in Establishment Clause jurisprudence may be leading to a regime break in that area (Lemon v. Kurtzman 1971). The reason(s) for regime change is an important area for inquiry, but it is an issue that we must leave for future research.

APPENDIX A: IDENTIFYING CANDIDATE JURISPRUDENTIAL REGIMES

To identify a candidate jurisprudential regime for an area of law, one first refers to casebooks and treatises in that area to understand the key case factors and the level of scrutiny or balancing the justices are to employ in assessing those case factors. Next, using Findlaw, one traces the case law back in time to the first precedent that gained the support of the majority of the Court, identified the relevant case factors, and indicated the level of scrutiny or how those factors should be balanced. Finally, one uses several casebooks representing a variety of political perspectives in the area of law to examine whether they identify this precedent with the candidate regime.

APPENDIX B: CODING

Table A1 shows the results of our analysis of the reliability and validity of the coding. Richards did all of the initial coding. Subsequently, we used SPSS to select randomly approximately 10% of the Court decisions. Another scholar then recoded these cases to assess reliability. The retest method is appropriate for reliability assessment if there are no concerns about reactivity or changes over time in the phenomena being observed (Carmines and Zeller 1979). Based on 3,836 items coded in common, the rate of agreement for the two coders is 93%. Among the sets of independent variables used in our analysis, the highest rate of agreement is 98% for the speaker identity variables (labeled identity in Table A1), and the lowest rate of agreement is 87% for the jurisprudential variables (labeled jurisprudence); this rate of agreement is fairly high, especially considering the interpretive nature of the coding for these factors. As a comparison, we looked at the reliability analysis James Gibson conducted as part of the Supreme Court Database Project. Several of the variables he coded were judgmental, and the level of reliability he found varied from 80 to 100% depending on the specific variable; the highest reliability was for whether the "value of church and state was implicated in the opinion" and the lowest was for whether the "value of government power is implicated in the decision" (Gibson 1997).

Note: Entries are simple percentages indicating rate of agreement. "Jurisprudence" refers to the jurisprudential variables used in the analysis. In contrast, "all jurisprudential variables coded" includes all jurisprudential variables coded but not necessarily used in the analysis. Likewise, "all variables coded" includes all variables coded but not necessarily used in the analysis. For a description of the procedures used to assess reliability and validity, please refer to Appendix B.

A second issue is whether Supreme Court opinions provide valid measures of the independent variables. One could argue that these variables are not independent of the Court's decision and could be influenced by law. To the extent that the concern is that the variables would be influenced by law, this would be even more true if we coded primarily from lower court opinions, so we chose Supreme Court opinions as our primary source. 17 However, we recognize the validity concern, and to assess validity we used SPSS to select randomly approximately 10% of the Court dicisions. Richards recoded these cases after a five-month interim using as the data source the written opinion of the highest court below the Supreme Court that issued a written opinion. We then compared the rate of agreement for the variables coded from the Supreme Court and the lower court opinions. The rate of agreement for the jurisprudential variables used in the analysis (labeled jurisprudence in Table A1) is 100%. The lowest rate of agreement is 99% for the identity and government variables. Based on 3,515 items coded in common from Supreme Court and lower court opinions, the overall rate of agreement is 99%, and the rate of agreement for all jurisprudential variables that were coded but not necessarily used in the analysis is also 99%. This leads us to the conclusion that coding solely from lower court opinions would not have significantly improved the validity of the variables. This analysis excluded Supreme Court per curiam opinions, because as part of the basic coding scheme we had already decided to use lower court opinions as the source when the Supreme Court wrote a per curiam opinion. For this analysis, obviously we also had to exclude lower court opinions that were not reported.

We include codebook instructions for the jurisprudential regime variables shown in the tables to show how they were coded. Note that in the statistical models, the coded variables are arranged in categorical sets. We have also specified the attitudes, identity, government, and action variables and the dependent variable. The coding was not done by deference to the majority opinion, which would bias the results, but rather according to the rules and examples delineated below after reading all majority, plurality, concurring, and dissenting opinions in each case.

Votes: For our dependent variable, we used individual justices' votes on all free speech cases from 1953 to 1998: 0 corresponds to a pro-expression rights vote; 1 corresponds to an anti-expression rights or progovernment vote. A pro-expression rights vote supports the right of the speaker over the government or private party attempting to limit the expression. An anti-expression rights vote indicates support for the government or private party seeking to limit expression over the speaker.

Attitudes: To estimate the influence of the attitudes of the justices, the standard measures based on content analysis of newspaper editorials about nominees at the time of nomination are used (Segal and Cover 1989; Segal et al. 1995).

Grayned: This variable captures whether a case was decided before or after Grayned and Mosley. Votes in the Grayned and Mosley companion cases are excluded from the analysis.

Jurisprudence: The set of variables labeled jurisprudence considers the basic components of the Grayned content-neutrality regime.

Threshold not met: This variable indicates whether a case reached the threshold of First Amendment protection. Cases in which there is no government action or there is no abridgment of speech do not invoke the protection of the First Amendment. For example, the First Amendment does not forbid nonpublic unions (acting not under statutory authority but rather independently) from limiting a union candidate's receipt of outside money for a union election, because there is no government action. This variable is coded 1 if a case fails to reach the threshold of First Amendment protection and 0 otherwise.

Content-based: Is the regulation of expression justified by or focused on the communicative impact of the expression? Communicative impact means the content or substance of the act of speech or expression. Content-based regulations are coded 1; others, 0. One type of content-based regulation, viewpoint discrimination, is relatively easy to identify. When the regulation targets the speech of a specific individual or group, for example, civil rights protesters, then the regulation is content-based. Content-based is broader category than viewpoint discrimination. Some cases involve content-based, but not viewpoint-based, regulations. One example of a dispute over content-based but viewpoint-netural legislation is Simon & Schuster, Inc. v. New York State Crime Victims Board (1991). The New York legislature passed a law that required that income derived from works describing the crime of an accused or convicted criminal be made available to the victims of a crime. Although the law did not burden a particular viewpoint, the Court unanimously noted that it was contentbased. The law "imposed a financial burden on speakers because of the content of their speech" (508; Smolla 1994, ch. 3, pp. 15–6). In coding for content-based regulations, evidence relating to the government's motive should be considered, in addition to the language of the regulation or statute and how it was applied (Tribe 1988).

<sup>17</sup> The exception is that in six Supreme Court per curiam cases where the Court's opinion said next to nothing, we used the available opinion of the highest lower court that heard the case before the Supreme Court to supplement the information.

Content-neutral: The content-neutral category covers four types of content-neutral regulations: time, place, manner, and incidental regulations (see examples and rules below). Content-neutral regulations do not focus on, and are not justified by, the content or communicative impact of expression. If a regulation is content-based, it cannot be content-neutral, even if it is a time, place, manner, or incidental regulation. Content-neutral regulations receive a value of 1; others, 0.

Content-neutral time regulations: The time category asks whether a regulation of expression limited the time of expression in a content-neutral manner. One example is an ordinance that prohibits noisy demonstrations immediately outside schools during school hours.

Content-neutral place regulations: The place category asks whether a regulation of expression limited the place of expression in a content-neutral manner. One example is an ordinance that prohibits noisy demonstrations immediately outside schools during school hours.

Content-neutral manner regulations: The manner category tests whether a content-neutral regulation attempts to cover the way in which an act of expression is presented. Some examples of manner regulations are limits on the number of participants in a demonstration, limits on the size or number of signs used, requirements for silent protest only, and bans on the use of amplification devices.

Content-neutral incidental regulations: This category asks whether a regulation is content-neutral but has incidental effects on speech. For example, a law against trespassing is not targeted at the content or viewpoint of speech, nor is it a time, place, or manner regulation. Despite its content-neutral character, when applied to protestors in a private location, the trespassing law has incidental effects on speech (Hudgens v. National Labor Relations Board 1976). Similarly, when a government requires all citizens to respond to grand jury subpoenas, this requirement has incidental implications for freedom of expression when applied to newspaper reporter (Branzburg v. Hayes 1972).

Less protected: This variable indicates whether the regulation in question is a regulation of expression that falls into one of the eight less protected categories. Less protected expression receives a value of 1; other expression, 0. This is the baseline category. The less protected categories are as follows.

Regulation of expression in a private forum against the will of the owner of that forum.

Regulations of expression that is obscene or alleged to be obscene.

Libel suits by private figures not suing for presumed or punitive damages.

Content-based, but not viewpoint-based regulations of speech in nonpublic forums. Examples of nonpublic forums include military bases, jails, prisons, and specific forums not open to the public at large such as candidate debates. The nonpublic forum category does not include private forums, traditional public forums such as streets, sidewalks, or parks, or forums that the government has designated public forums.

Regulation of commercial expression. Commercial expression is expression that concerns lawful commercial activity. Commercial activity is the interchange of goods and services among individuals and corporations.

Content-based regulations of the broadcast media. The broadcast media includes television and radio. This category does not include cable television. Examples include requirements for public access to such media.

Regulations of expression in schools. Schools include elementary through high schools.

Regulations of picketing of secondary sites by labor unions.

Action: The action variables consider the type of action taken against the speaker.

Criminal: When the action taken against the speaker is based on a criminal law, the value is 1; otherwise it is 0.

Deny expression: When the action taken against the speaker is to deny the speaker's opportunity for expression, the value is 1; otherwise it is 0.

Deny benefit: When the action taken against the speaker is to deny the speaker a tangible government benefit, the value is 1; otherwise it is 0.

Disciplinary: When the action taken against the speaker is to discipline the speaker, such as a bar association disciplinary committee's public reprimand of a lawyer, the value is 1; otherwise it is 0.

Lose employment: When the action taken against the speaker is to cause the speaker to lose government employment, the value is 1; otherwise it is 0.

Civil: When the action taken against the speaker is a civil suit or a judge's civil order such as an injunction, the value is 1; otherwise it is 0. This is the baseline category.

Regulation: When the action taken against the speaker is a regulation without a clearly specified civil or criminal penalty that does not fall into the above categories, the value is 1; otherwise it is 0.

Government: The government variables consider the level of government acting against the speaker.

Private: When the case involves a private lawsuit against the speaker, the value is 1; otherwise it is 0.

Education: When the level of government is a school, school board, university, or college, the value is 1; otherwise it is 0.

Local: When the government is below the state level, for example, a town, city, or country, the value is 1; otherwise it is 0.

Federal: When the federal government is acting against the speaker, the value is 1; otherwise it is 0.

State: When the level of government is a state, the value is 1; otherwise it is 0. This is the baseline category.

Other: When none of the above categories are applicable (for example, Puerto Rico), the value is 1; otherwise it is 0.

Identity: The identity variables consider the identity of the speaking party.

Politician: When the speaker is an office-holding politician, the value is 1; otherwise it is 0.

Racial minority: When the speaker is speaking as a racial minority, the value is 1; otherwise it is 0.

Alleged communist: When the speaker is speaking as a communist, the value is 1; otherwise it is 0.

Military protester: When the speaker is speaking as a war or military protester, the value is 1; otherwise it is 0.

Business: When the speaker is speaking as a member of, or for, a corporation or business, the value is 1; otherwise it is 0.

Religious: When the speaker is speaking as a member of a religion, the value is 1; otherwise it is 0.

 $\bar{P}$ rint media: When the speaker is print media, the value is 1; otherwise it is 0.

Broadcast media: When the speaker is broadcast media, the value is 1; otherwise it is 0.

Other: When all of the above identity variables equal 0, the value is 1; otherwise it is 0. This is the baseline category.

We also coded for broadcast media, politicians, candidates, feminists, racists, and members and supporters of labor unions, but these variables were not close to being significant estimators.

APPENDIX C: CHOW TEST

Our version of the Chow test compares the  $-2 \log$  likelihood of the regression including all cases to the  $-2 \log$  likelihood for a model introducing interaction between a dummy variable representing whether a case was decided before or after the regime was established (regime dummy) and the other independent variables. This produces a chi-square test for change in the parameters across the two time periods before and after the regime change.

Alternatively, one may proceed as follows. First, estimate the logistic regression equation across all cases including a dummy variable representing the regime change. Next, estimate two separate logistic regressions, one before and after the regime. Subtracting the sum of the  $-2 \log$  likelihood of the before and after regressions from the  $-2 \log$  likelihood of the regression including all cases provides a chi-square statistic. The latter approach provides separate parameter estimates for the different periods, and it was used where such estimates were desired.

Electoral Competition, Political Uncertainty, and Policy Insulation

RUI J. P. DE FIGUEIREDO, JR. University of California, Berkeley

Thy are government bureaus not necessarily organized to implement policy effectively? One view holds that a main culprit is political uncertainty. Elected officials know that they will not hold office forever, so they use "insulating" structures that constrain bureaucratic discretion, making bureaus less subject to sabotage but also less effective. I revise this theory by modeling how public officials choose administrative structures. I show that in systems with few veto points, groups will be most likely to act cooperatively on policy when political uncertainty is greatest. In contrast, in systems with many veto points, only electorally weak groups will insulate policies from future interference, therefore shifting focus from uncertainty to electoral strength. Because the conditions that lead to policy insulation are rare, electoral competition should not be thought of as a primary cause of bureaucratic inefficiency.

he frequently voiced complaint that government bureaucracies are both ineffective and inefficient has caused many political scientists to ask why bureaus are not necessarily organized to implement policy effectively. One view holds that in modern democracies, a main culprit is uncertainty resulting from electoral competition. According to this view, because elected officials know that they will not hold office forever, they look for ways to ensure that the policies they enact will survive their tenure. This aspect of democratic politics has led scholars to claim, first, that political uncertainty creates an opportunity and incentive for opposed groups to sabotage each others' policies; second, that this threat leads public officials to legislate organizational structures that "insulate" bureaus from future pressure from opposing groups; and, third, that this insulation makes public organizations relatively ineffective. This conventional account, however, raises several important questions concerning the relationship among electoral uncertainty, policy insulation, and bureaucratic inefficiency. How do the incentives to insulate agencies vary with the degree of political uncertainty? Do these effects vary across types of democratic institutions, such as presidential and parliamentary systems? Given the answers to the two previous questions, to what extent is electoral competition a primary cause of bureaucratic inefficiency?

I examine these questions by modeling how politicians and the groups they represent choose the structures by which policy will be implemented. The analysis makes three contributions to the literature on bureaucratic structure and performance. First, in systems where it is easy to overturn legislation—in other words, in systems with relatively few veto points, such as two-party parliamentary systems—groups are more likely to cooperate on policy when they are most uncertain about the likely outcome of elections. For electorally weak groups, cooperating on policy is very attractive; during all of the periods when these groups are out of power, they benefit from cooperation, which they will happily trade in exchange for occasionally giving up some possible benefits when they are in power. Electorally strong groups, however, have precisely the opposite incentives: They are not willing to make the same trade. Unless all groups have an incentive to cooperate, cooperation will fail.

As competition becomes more balanced, these incentives are muted. Here, all groups value benefits when they are out of power more, and this makes reciprocal threats of being excluded from policy compromises more effective. As competition increases and uncertainty is maximized, policy cooperation, not sabotage, is most likely.

A second result is that when insulation is durable, when multiple veto points make it hard to change administrative structure, only electorally weak groups will attempt to protect their policies. These groups are willing to bear the costs of insulating policies when they are in power, in exchange for some benefits when they are out of power. Electorally strong groups, however, will not have the same incentives. They know that even if their policies are removed when they leave office, they will be back in power and able to reestablish them. They will not be willing to pay the costs of insulating their policies to lock in benefits gained while in office. The model, therefore, predicts that insulation will be observed only under conditions of certainty. It further predicts that even in cases of certainty, groups' incentives to insulate bureaucracies will be asymmetric: Only weak groups will use an idiosyncratic opportunity to lock in programmatic benefits.

These results point to a third contribution, returning to the original question. To what extent can ineffectively designed agencies be ascribed to the effects of electoral competition? Contrary to the literature, the answer offered here is: probably very little. The reason is that in separation of powers systems, groups that are electorally weak are the ones that will choose inefficient structures to insulate their policies. But by definition, these groups rarely gain office. Consequently, little policymaking is likely to be affected by this dynamic. Groups that are more regularly in power, alternatively, do not have the same incentives to pay a cost to lock in benefits. Therefore, the incentives described in the theory should only rarely create occasions for insulation from future sabotage.

THE COSTLY INSULATION HYPOTHESIS

Recently, scholars (Horn 1995; McCubbins, Noll, and Weingast 1987, 1989; Moe 1989, 1990, 1991; Rothenberg 1994) have begun to develop a non-formal theory that relates electoral uncertainty, organizational constraints on bureaucracy, and bureaucratic efficiency. According to these scholars, political uncertainty induced by electoral competition means that "today's winners" know that, at some point, they will be out of power. Their loss of control will give opponents an opportunity to undo their policies (Moe 1990). The potential for such destructive behavior means that today's winners will try to protect their policies against the future actions of their opponents (Moe 1989).

Interest groups, working through elected representatives, can protect their favored policies from interference by creating an implementation apparatus usually, but not exclusively, through organizational structure—that limits policy drift. Among these structural "insulation" mechanisms, politicians can write detailed legislation, emphasize professionalism, limit oversight and other forms of political involvement, assign policies to a "friendly" part of the government hierarchy, and enhance the role of the judiciary (McCubbins, Noll, and Weingast 1987, 1989; Moe 1989, 274–5). Each of these aspects of organizational structure allows politicians to bias agency policies so that, even after their political creators leave office, the agency will run on "autopilot," continuing on its original policy course (McCubbins, Noll, and Weingast 1987).

There is another potential problem, however, for today's winners. As Moe (1989, 1990) explains, the insulating mechanisms themselves could be overturned. How do officials overcome this problem? The answer is legislation. Because of the multiplicity of veto points in the legislative process under a separation of powers system, new laws are extremely difficult to pass, for a minority can block new legislation. This means that when a group can gain enough control to overcome barriers to legislating, it utilizes this "moment in the sun" to formalize not only its mandate but also the insulation of that mandate. This difficulty in passing legislation means that when it can be passed, it is likely to remain in place for a longer time.

This durability of legislated insulation mechanisms in a separation of powers system can be contrasted with legislative durability in a unicameral two-party parliamentary system. As Moe and Caldwell (1994) point out, in a parliamentary system, unitary control means that legislation is not difficult to pass. Therefore, using organizational structure as a means for cementing policies will not be effective in these systems. Insulation of the type found in the United States is not available in parliamentary systems.

The final insight from this literature is that the mechanisms by which a program or agency is insulated from future interference are not costless. By limiting an agency's flexibility and expertise, policy insulation increases the costs to implement policy and reduces an agency's effectiveness. As Moe (1990, 137) summarizes, "The driving force of political uncertainty, then, causes the winning group to favor structural designs it would never favor on technical grounds alone. . . . The group has to protect itself and its agency from the dangers of democracy, and it does so by imposing structures that appear strange and incongruous indeed when judged by almost any reasonable standards of what an effective organization ought to look like." Thus, bureaucracy is "inefficient by design" (Moe 1991).

Although this literature has significantly advanced our understanding of bureaucracy, inadequately examined claims and implications remain. For example, no systematic account has been provided of variation in electoral competition across time and space. Uncertainty has been greater in the postwar United States than in Japan, for example. Even within the United States, interest groups face differing likelihoods of gaining a "moment in the sun." Compare, for example, the more balanced interest-group competition between business and labor before World War II to that of the oft-cited example of business versus consumers. Scholars have alluded to the importance of this variation (Moe 1990), but the literature has suffered from unclear predictions about the conditions under which the incentives to lock in benefits will outweigh the costs incurred by doing so and from an overemphasis on cases in which "new" groups gain advantage. Similarly, the literature does provide a broad comparison of parliamentary and presidential systems, but it does not explicitly explain how these effects compare at different levels of political uncertainty. Finally, the claim that bureaucratic inefficiency can be accounted for by the dynamics of policy insulation is never supported by an explicit connection between the conditions for policy insulation and the likelihood of observing those conditions.

THE RECIPROCITY GAME

To address these shortcomings, I develop simple formal models of structural choice that capture the spirit of the non-formal theory of policy insulation just described. The intention is to follow the original theory as closely as possible, stating its assumptions formally to understand whether the stated results necessarily follow. To that end, the basic components of the formalization follow the central principles of that theory: that the primary actors are interest groups; that structural choices are "inefficient," meaning that insulation reduces the value of the policy to the implementing group and, conversely, that there can be gains from avoiding these costs; that play is dynamic, so that groups are long-lived and benefits, costs, and strategies are forward-looking; and that uncertainty is inherent to political outcomes. To capture these features, I begin by presenting a model that most closely resembles parliamentary systems: In such systems, legislation is relatively easy to pass for the current holders of public authority (Moe and Caldwell 1994). In this first model, policy stability can be achieved only through acquiescence by all groups. I subsequently present a model that more closely resembles a separation of powers system in which players can implement insulating structures.

The first game is an infinite repetition of a two-player interest-group game. Following Calvert (1989), I call this the reciprocity game (RG). In each period t, a nonstrategic player called Nature selects either A or B to move. The probability that A is selected in any stage is  $\gamma \in (0, 1)$ . A substantive interpretation for  $\gamma$  is the probability of A's supporters being elected, so  $1-\gamma$  is the probability of B's supporters being elected. Obviously, the degree of political uncertainty increases as  $\gamma$  approaches  $0.5.^2$  As  $\gamma$  moves toward either of its bounds, a particular group's reelection chances become more and more certain.

Definition 1. Political uncertainty is decreasing in $|\gamma - 0.5|$ .

Each player has its "own" program. In each turn in which it is selected, the player implements its program with certainty.<sup>3</sup> Further, if the other player's program is in place, the moving player must decide whether it will remove the other player's program.<sup>4</sup> In these cases, the player has to choose from the action set  $A_{it} = \{O; NO\}$ , where I denote "overturn" O and "not overturn" NO. If a player chooses O, then the other player's program is not in effect in that stage.

In each stage, a player's payoffs depend on which programs are in place. If A's program is in place by itself, then the payoffs, expressed as  $(u_{At}, u_{Bt}) = (A$ 's payoff, B's payoff), are (1,0). If B's program is in place by itself, the payoffs are symmetrically (0, 1). If both players' programs are in place, then both players get a payoff,  $\beta \in (0, 1)$  (i.e., the payoffs in the stage are  $(\beta, \beta)$ ). Therefore, if a player chooses NO when given the opportunity, it is accepting a loss of  $1-\beta$  in that iteration. Note that this construction of payoffs is extremely flexible. For example, if  $\beta=0.5$ , then choosing NO means that a player splits the available benefits with the other player. Alternatively, if  $\beta>0.5$ , then choosing NO is welfare-improving, for the total benefits are greater than one.

A player's payoff is the sum of these stage payoffs, discounted by a factor  $\delta \in (0, 1)$  for each stage. Thus, the payoffs for each player can be calculated as

$$U_{it} = \sum_{t=0}^{\infty} \delta^t u_{it}, \qquad i = \{A, B\}.$$

A player's strategy describes what a player will do given all possible histories  $H_{\tau}$  of the game to that point. Player i's strategy is a function  $s_i$  that in each stage maps all possible histories into a choice  $\{O, NO\}$ . In particular, a player's strategy in turn T depends on  $N^T = (n_1, n_2, \ldots, n_T)$ , which is a record of the random selections made by Nature in each turn t to that point,  $A_A^T = (A_{A1}, A_{A2}, \ldots, A_{A(T-1)})$  and  $A_B^T = (A_{B1}, A_{B2}, \ldots, A_{B(T-1)})$ . Further, I assume that in all stages there is complete information. In other words, players know the structure of the game, including the parameter values represented by the triple  $(\delta, \beta, \gamma)$ , the history of the game to that point  $h_{\tau}$ , and the strategy being employed by the other player.

The solution concept I employ is subgame perfection. In other words, players will be playing optimal strategies at each point for every point forward. In infinitely repeated games, there invariably exist a multiplicity of equilibria. A number of "folk" theorems have demonstrated that, given sufficiently patient players, every feasible payoff set that is individually rational can be supported as a Nash equilibrium (Fudenberg and Tirole 1991). To analyze these types of games, one conventionally posits a set of equilibrium strategies for the players and then determines under what subsets of the parameters of the game such strategies can be supported as an equilibrium. To obtain these conditions, one must state the expected payoffs to playing a particular strategy and identify the conditions under which playing such a strategy is a best response given the other player's equilibrium strategy.

I am particularly interested in the conditions under which cooperation can be sustained as an equilibrium. Cooperative equilibria are defined as those in which, on the equilibrium path, both players choose NO in every stage. In general, in repeated games in which discounting is not too extreme, strategies exist that can result in sustained cooperation (Bendor and Mookherjee 1987). Following this solution concept, I consider the parameter space under which cooperative equilibria can be

Although the focus here is on the relationship between electoral probabilities and political uncertainty, one might also be able to interpret  $\gamma$  as the degree of "optimism" (or "pessimism"). Groups are increasingly optimistic as their probability of winning rises. Similarly, one might think of the group with the probability greater than 0.5 as being the optimistic group and, conversely, the group with the probability less than 0.5 as the pessimistic one.

&lt;sup>5</sup> The assumption of equal payoffs to both sides is important in establishing Proposition 2, which follows. I employ this assumption for two reasons. First, in some situations, such "splitting of the benefits" will obtain in practice. Second, even if one assumes that the payoffs are not the same for the winner and the loser, as long as there are benefits to cooperation, the results in Proposition 2 will remain substantively the same, as will be shown in the case of spatial utility functions. Further, although  $\gamma$  is assumed to be exogenous, under many types of endogeneity, such as incumbency advantages, the substantive results that follow will hold.

that follow with floid:

6 For clarification,  $n_t \in \{A, B\}$  and  $A_{it} = \begin{cases} \emptyset & \text{if } i \neq n_t \\ \{O, NO\} & \text{otherwise.} \end{cases}$  So, let  $h_t = n_t \times A_{At} \times A_{Bt}$  and  $H_t = \{h_1, h_2, \dots, h_{t-1}, n_t\}$ ; then for period  $t, s_{tt} : H_t, \rightarrow \{O, NO\}$ .

sustained for a punishment strategy commonly referred to as grim trigger. Under grim trigger, each player will cooperate only as long as the other player has always cooperated.

Definition 2. A player i plays a grim trigger strategy if in each stage, it plays NO if the other player has played NO in every turn previously. If the other player has ever played O, then i plays O for every turn thereafter, given the opportunity.

I analyze equilibria under grim trigger for two reasons. First, grim trigger is a particularly suitable strategy to analyze for repeated games of complete and perfect information. The reason is that with perfect information, grim trigger is the most extreme form of punishment that is still subgame perfect (Bianco and Bates 1990). That it is subgame perfect with complete information is straightforward: The punishment strategies are, for the RG, simply Nash-reversion strategies, which means that they are subgame perfect off the equilibrium path (Morrow 1994, 266).<sup>7</sup> In this sense, grim trigger is a test case, a necessary condition, for cooperation to be a Nash equilibrium. If cooperation cannot be sustained under a grim trigger punishment strategy, it is unsustainable under any feasible strategy. Second, it is reasonable to assume that in practice, players will not play such extreme strategies. However, the results that follow in Propositions 1 and 2 hold for any finite period punishment phase. In other words, even if players punish deviators only for a few periods, the results will be qualitatively the same.8

Given this approach, it is possible to characterize cooperative equilibria in the RG.

PROPOSITION 1. Given  $\delta$  and  $\gamma$ , if  $\beta$  is sufficiently high, cooperation can be sustained.

Proposition 1 demonstrates that under certain conditions, it is possible to sustain cooperation. <sup>10</sup> In interest-group competition, there are a number of reasons  $\beta$  might be sufficiently high. If groups value policy continuity, there will be a payoff to cooperation. Groups might value continuity for one of two reasons: First, they could be risk averse; second, policies could be more effective with lower policy volatility. Another reason  $\beta$  could be large is that much political bargaining takes place across more than one dimension. If the players care differently about the dimensions—for example, about pork in their home district versus pork in another district—then compromise positions will potentially yield benefits for all players.

That cooperation can be sustained is not very surprising. It has been shown in a number of different repeated games that as long as the penalties for cooperation are not too stiff (expressed here as a sufficiently high  $\beta$ ), and the players value the future sufficiently (in other words, if  $\delta$  is sufficiently high), cooperation can be sustained. Proposition 1, however, allows me to obtain comparative statics concerning the relationship between uncertainty and cooperation.

PROPOSITION 2. As  $\gamma$  approaches 0.5, cooperation can be sustained over a wider range of the parameters.

Proposition 2, illustrated in Figure 1, contains a surprising result: As political uncertainty increases, reciprocity becomes easier to sustain. 11 This is interesting for three reasons. First, it is distinct from the many results concerning discount factors in infinitely repeated games. In particular, numerous folk theorems state that as the discount factor increases, as the players place a greater value on future opportunities, cooperation can be sustained over a wider range of the parameter values.<sup>12</sup> This is not the case with the parameter  $\gamma$ . As shown in Figure 1, the parameter values over which cooperation is an equilibrium are not monotonically increasing in  $\gamma$ . Instead, the cooperative space is parabolic, with a vertex at one-half. The source of this pattern is the complementary nature of the reelection parameter. Because both players must choose NO for a cooperative outcome to be achieved under grim trigger strategies, and an increase in one player's reelection

&lt;sup>8</sup> As mentioned, we use the solution concept of subgame perfection. Some game theorists argue that a more appropriate solution concept for repeated games of this nature is renegotiation proofness. The basic concern about subgame perfection is that even if players are playing optimal responses to other players' strategies, following a deviation, the punisher could have an incentive to go back to playing the original equilibrium; if players can confer about their strategies during play, it will be in the punisher's interest at least to try a renegotiation. In this game, however, it is possible to construct a set of strategies that are renegotiation proof: Players execute finite punishment periods in which the deviator participates in the punishment. Under these more complex strategies, Propositions 1 and 2 remain substantively the same.

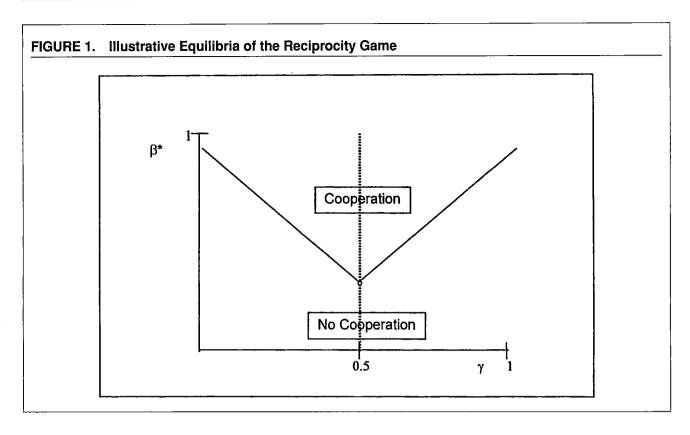

Note that proofs of the propositions appear in the Appendix; proofs of all other results are available from the author upon request.

&lt;sup>11</sup> It is interesting to compare these results to those of Calvert (1989). Propositions 1 and 2, with a few caveats, can be considered refinements of Calvert's model. He considers a case in which the probability of one group (say A) asking for a favor is extremely low, while the probability of the other group (say B) asking for a favor is very high (which would correspond to  $\gamma \to 1$  or  $\gamma \to 0$  in the RG). He finds that in this case, the ratio of A's costs for giving a favor to its benefits for receiving one must be "tiny" for reciprocity to obtain. This result conforms with the intuition behind Propositions 1 and 2. The structure under which these results are obtained has an important difference from my results, however. Whereas in Calvert's model the probabilities of the two players' offering cooperative favors are independent, in the RG they are dependent (specifically, if one player has a probability  $\gamma$  of winning, then the other has  $1 - \gamma$ ). It is this dependence between the probabilities of having an opportunity (in Calvert's terminology) that generates the parabolic nature of the cooperative parameter space in the RG. Further, Calvert's players move simultaneously, whereas control in the RG is exclusive to a single player in any stage t, which more closely conforms to a situation in which there is winner-take-all competition for public authority. These refinements are important later when insulation decisions are examined. (Calvert 1989, 270-3, 276-9). See also Alesina 1988, Besley and Coate 1998, and Coate and Morris 1999 for models of electoral competition and economic policy.

chances implies a decrease in the other's, as  $\gamma$  moves toward its extreme values, an increased propensity to cooperate by one player is complemented by a decrease in the other player's likelihood of cooperating. Thus, as reelection probabilities jointly move toward the middle values, the parameter space for cooperation increases.

Second, this result is interesting because it runs counter to the claim made in the literature that uncertainty will create incentives to sabotage previous policies. According to Proposition 2, although increasing uncertainty about retaining political power gives opponents greater opportunities to undo what a currently prevailing group implements, it also gives players a greater payoff for cooperating. Thus, as long as the penalties for cooperation are not prohibitive, uncertainty provides incentives for constructive rather than reciprocally destructive behavior. More generally still, the intuition is powerful: In a democratic institutional structure, repeated play in itself is not sufficient to sustain cooperation. Instead, it is precisely the possibility of losing power that enables players to employ punishment strategies that can effectively engender coopera-

Finally, as noted by Moe and Caldwell (1994), in parliamentary systems, legislation is easy to pass for those who hold public authority. This means that, in contrast to presidential systems, legislating insulated agency structures will not tie the hands of those that follow: The legislation that is designed to insulate can itself be overturned by future holders of public authority. This is precisely the situation described by the RG, in which the players do not have an option to insulate. In this sense, the RG makes an important prediction about cooperation between groups in a parliamentary system: When no dominant group exists, cooperation will be more prevalent. In other words, when there is electoral balance, cooperative, and perhaps even moderate, outcomes will be most likely to obtain.

Before considering the effects of insulation strategies, it is useful to consider the generality of these results. One issue is that in many cases (including many of those described in the literature) competition is on a single dimension—the history of labor, environment, and consumer protection policies, for example, all might be described in this way. This raises the question whether the results still hold where policy competition is so direct.

As long as the players exhibit sufficient aversion to risk, the results in Propositions 1 and 2 hold. Indeed, the degree of "cooperative benefit" represented by  $\beta$  could be interpreted in the traditional setting of negative quadratic spatial preferences in a unidimensional policy space. To see this, consider a case in which the players have normal quadratic-stage game payoffs in a policy space  $x \in X \equiv \Re$ , represented by the utility function  $u_i = -(x - x_i)^2$ ,  $i \in \{A, B\}$ . Without loss of generality, the players' ideal points are  $x_A = 0$  and  $x_B > 0$ . Now, when a player holds public authority, it must pick a policy.

In this model, there is a region in X over which each player will be willing to cooperate. Specifically, A will cooperate if B cooperates and if  $x \in \{-x_B\sqrt{\delta(1-\gamma)}, x_B\sqrt{\delta(1-\gamma)}\}$ . Similarly, B will cooperate if A cooperates and  $x \in \{x_B(1-\sqrt{\delta\gamma}), x_B(1+\sqrt{\delta\gamma})\}$ . Because cooperative equilibria require both sides to cooperate, these equilibria will exist only if these two regions intersect. In other words, they will exist if the highest policy A would accept in a cooperative equilibrium is higher than the lowest policy B would accept in a cooperative equilibrium. A closer examination of these bounds also reveals that their size increases as  $\gamma$  moves to 0.5. Thus, even if conflict is one-dimensional, Proposition 2 holds. In other words, the assumption of negative quadratic utility functions in a unidimensional policy space is simply a special case of the model presented above.

A second extension considers what happens when control over public authority can be divided. Here I extend the model to analyze a case in which there are k institutions. For simplicity, assume that a policy change requires control of the full set of institutions, or undivided control over public authority. I assume that the probability that a group controls any single institution is the same as before. To provide an intuition, I assume that the probabilities of holding authority over any one of the institutions are independent across k.  $^{13}$

With this modification, again the parameter space for which cooperative equilibria is the largest is when political uncertainty is maximal. The logic of this result is that the payoffs of cooperation for both A and B are the same as in the earlier formulation with a single institution. To calculate the payoffs off the equilibrium path, I must first calculate the probabilities of three possible states: undivided control for A, undivided control for B, and split control. These occur with probability  $\gamma^k$ ,  $(1-\gamma)^k$ , and  $1-\gamma^k-(1-\gamma)^k$ , respectively. In a noncooperative equilibrium, the last policy emerging from undivided control is retained with a higher probability than in the previous formulation. For example, if A's policy is the status quo, then the likelihood that A will be the policy in the following period is the probability that A obtains undivided control or control is divided, or  $1-(1-\gamma)^k$ . However, if B's policy is the status quo, then the probability that A's program will be implemented is only the probability that A gains undivided control or  $\gamma^k$ , which is lower. In this sense, policy implementation under separation of powers exhibits "stickiness." Further, this stickiness advantages the stronger player: Whoever is more likely to control the institutions on average will have its program in place for an even longer time than in the game with only singular institutions. This means that the stronger player will have an even weaker incentive to comply with any cooperative equilibrium.

The attenuation of incentives has a number of implications. First, the minimum  $\beta$  for which cooperation can be sustained will be weakly higher, meaning that cooperation will be more difficult to obtain. Second, as before, these incentives are dulled when competition is relatively even. The intuition is similar to Proposition 2 above. When a player is extremely strong, it has little incentive to cooperate. With the addition of multiple veto points, this effect becomes magnified; with even smaller increases in the stronger player's electoral chances, the parameter space for cooperation shrinks. In the reverse case, however, as the players become more equal, the incremental effect decreases, making cooperation easier to sustain, as Proposition 2 states. Thus, despite the change in the level of gains from trade required to obtain cooperation, the comparative statics within the institutional structure, that cooperation is easiest to sustain when electoral chances are even, remain the same.

THE INSULATION GAME

The results just presented provide a general context for an analysis of uncertainty, but the extant theory explains that in systems with separated powers, overturn and sabotage are not the only recourse for groups. Through the use of organization structure, groups can waylay such sabotage attempts.

This description points to a further refinement to the RG. I therefore introduce the insulation game (IG), in which groups can insulate an agency from sabotage. The structure of the IG is similar to that of the RG. As with the RG, the game is between two players, A and B, and is repeated indefinitely. Again, players implement their proposals with certainty, and, if the other player's program is in place, the moving player has the option of either overturning (O) or not overturning (NO). The players must make an additional strategic choice: whether to insulate their agency or not. When implementing its program, a player must choose from the action set  $\{I, NI\}$ , in which I denotes insulate and NI denotes not insulate. To capture the notion that this opportunity is available only rarely, a player makes this decision only during the first period in which it is recognized.

In each stage, if a player plays NI, then its payoffs are identical to those in the RG. However, if a player chooses I, its payoffs are modified by a factor  $\alpha$  that is strictly less than  $1(\alpha < 1)$ . The benefit to the player of playing I is that, irrespective of the other players' play from {O; NO}, the insulating player's program remains in place forever. Thus, if the other player's program is in place, the insulating player receives  $\alpha\beta$ ; otherwise, it receives  $\alpha$  (which, by construction, is greater than  $\alpha\beta$ ). In the process of formalization, then, I am able to define more precisely what policy "insulation" means. Specifically, insulation can be thought of in either of two equally valid ways. On the one hand, insulation is a mechanism whereby groups or officials can avoid punishment strategies. Because insulation locks in benefits, groups can act destructively without fear of retribution. On the other hand, insulation mechanisms are those that trade benefits when in power for benefits when out of power; groups can smooth their benefits. This construction allows me to interrogate the conditions under which an agency will be insulated and those under which it will not be. In particular, Propositions 3a, 3b, and 3c characterize equilibrium strategies and outcomes as the cost of insulation, parameterized by  $\alpha$ , varies.14

Proposition 3a. If  $\alpha$  is sufficiently large, both players will play  $\{(I, O)\}$ .

PROPOSITION 3b. If  $\alpha$  is not sufficiently large for both players to play  $\{(I, O)\}$ , then an equilibrium for the IG is either  $\{(I, O); (NI, O)\}$  or  $\{(NI, O); (I, O)\}$  if  $\alpha$  is sufficiently large.

PROPOSITION 3c. If  $\alpha$  is sufficiently small, then neither player will insulate.

Propositions 3a through 3c show that when insulation is too costly, groups will leave policies unprotected. This is consistent with intuition but also provides a much better understanding of the behavior of competing groups. As the extant theory contends, the prospect of future competition forces groups to insulate and, therefore, can cripple agencies by design. However, the results from the IG indicate that this account is incomplete: Only if the cost is relatively minor will agencies be insulated. If the cost is moderate, then, depending on the reelection potential of the group, only one group will choose to insulate. And if the cost is prohibitive, neither agency will insulate and the players will play the reciprocity game.

Propositions 3a, 3b, and 3c allow me to return to the primary question about the relationship between political uncertainty and the decision to insulate. According to the literature, it is the fact of uncertainty that causes groups to insulate. As shown in Proposition 4, electoral uncertainty interacts with the cost of insulation to determine equilibrium behavior.

Proposition 4. Under the conditions given in Propositions 3a through 3c, as political uncertainty increases, the parameter space over which either both players insulate or neither player insulates increases, while the parameter space for which a single player insulates decreases.

When combined with Propositions 3a through 3c, Proposition 4 conveys a richer understanding of insulating mechanisms as a structural choice. <sup>15</sup> Under fairly general conditions, we can characterize an equilibrium for the IG. As shown in Figure 2, the equilibrium will depend on a combination of both the costs of insulation and the probability of reelection. As the costs of insulation increase (as  $\alpha$  decreases), only those with a very small chance of being elected will insulate. Thus, they ensure that they get some benefits on an ongoing basis, an incentive that outweights the cost incurred by overburdening an agency with procedures.

Proposition 4 provides two characterizations of the relationship between political uncertainty and insulation. First, it shows that as long as there is some political uncertainty, public organizations will be less effective than private ones. To see this, compare two cases: an organization operating like a private one, with no electoral uncertainty, and an organization in which uncertainty exists. In the former case, as Proposition 4 shows, insulation will never be employed. In the latter case, uncertainty can give groups an incentive to insulate. Second, as shown in Figure 2, Proposition 4 also allows us to consider how the incentives to insulate change as uncertainty changes. Interestingly, as political uncertainty decreases, one of the groups (that which is most commonly out of power) will be willing to bear greater costs, as represented by  $\alpha$ , to preserve benefits. As political uncertainty increases, however, we have a mixed result. For some levels of costs, both groups will insulate. For others, neither will insulate. Thus, while political uncertainty might lead to insulation, it might have the exact opposite effect, eliminating any chance of it.  $^{16}$

More importantly, Proposition 4 indicates that to explain variation among agencies, focusing on uncertainty is inappropriate. Instead, insulation is most likely in situations where there are electoral asymmetries. Moreover, I can make a more precise statement: Groups that are electorally weak will be the most likely to insulate.

This prediction has an important implication. When group power is unbalanced, the policies of the weaker group will be less effectively implemented than those of the dominant group. Because only the weaker group will insulate its policies, only its policies will bear the costs of inefficiency that go with such insulation. In this sense, the relative value and competence of the weaker group will be self-confirming: When it gets its moment in the sun, it is not able to implement their policies as effectively as the stronger groups.

The IG also illuminates another aspect of agency performance: the degree to which political uncertainty will lead to inefficient agencies. According to Moe, along with political compromise, uncertainty means that bureaucracies are "designed to be inefficient." Propositions 3 and 4, however, clarify the claim that bureaucracy is "inefficient by design." First, they establish a lower bound on how inefficient agencies will be due to political uncertainty. If the costs of insulation in terms of program performance are high, groups will choose not to insulate their programs. Second, only groups that have very weak future electoral prospects will insulate. This means that when the usual winners erect agencies, they will not be hampered by such organizational designs. Assuming that the distribution of agency creation is spread evenly over time, most agencies will be uninsulated. Therefore, inefficiency cannot be widely attributed to electoral competition.

Once again, it is useful to consider the robustness of these results. One simplification made in the IG is the assumption that insulation mechanisms survive for the life of the game. In practice, insulation is subject to repeal. This is reflected in the literature on bureaucratic insulation (Moe 1989, 1990), in which two states are implicitly assumed: divided versus unified control of public authority. When a group has control of all the veto points, it can pass legislation. This means that a group can implement administrative structures that insulate agencies. Undivided control also allows the group to repeal earlier legislation, including insulating mechanisms passed previously. When control is divided, groups cannot pass legislation. Instead, they can affect the direction of policy only when previous policies were not protected. An alternative, and perhaps more realistic, assumption for the IG, therefore, is that insulating mechanisms survive only as long as the opposing group does not gain undivided control of the institutional apparatus.

To explore this situation, I modify the IG. Assume that there are k institutions, or veto points, each with an independent probability  $\gamma$  of being controlled by group A. If a group insulates its program, it obtains a payoff  $\alpha$  until the insulated program is repealed. If a group chooses not to insulate, then its payoffs are a function of the number of institutions j within its power in a given period. For simplicity, I assume that this function is linear in j, taking the form j/k. These assumptions capture two features implicit in the literature (Moe 1989, 1990): First, if a program is not insulated, it will "drift" in the direction of its current institutional overseers via nonstatutory means; second, legislation is hard to pass and is possible only in the rare moments when control is complete.

For this model, it is sufficient to analyze the incentives of a potential insulating group. As before, not surprisingly, as the costs of insulation decrease—as  $\alpha$  gets larger—players have a stronger incentive to insulate. More importantly, even when it is assumed that insulating mechanisms can be overturned when new legislation is passed, the level of costs necessary to encourage insulation decreases in  $\gamma$ . In other words, it is still the case that as the probability of winning an electoral contest increases, the incentive to insulate declines, as in Proposition 4.

The intuition for this result can be seen by comparing the expected value for choosing to insulate or not. Formally, the expected payoff for player i from taking either action is where S(t) is the probability that i's opponent does not have unified control up to period t or, alternatively, the probability that i's action "survives" to period t. Note that the two terms on the left side are unaffected by whether or not programs have been protected. The difference under the two choices is the expected value represented by the summation on the right-hand side. In the insulated case, this payoff is always  $\alpha$  irrespective of how many veto points j the group controls. But if a group chooses not to insulate when given the opportunity, this payoff depends on how many veto points it holds, which in turn increases with the probability of winning any given veto point. Thus, players are still trading off costs when in power against benefits when out of power. A group that is pessimistic about its future prospects and leaves its program uninsulated will see the program captured by a more powerful group even if that group does not have an opportunity to overturn the legislation. Thus, weak or vulnerable groups will be willing to pay a large cost to secure a smaller ongoing stream of benefits. On the other hand, stronger groups will be more optimistic about their ability to control bureaucratic drift and therefore will be less willing to pay those costs of insulation.

TWO ILLUSTRATIVE EXAMPLES

A few stylized examples illustrate the mechanisms evaluated in the models. Moe (1989, 1990, 1991) and others (e.g., Horn 1995) provide evidence that groups with a tenuous hold on public authority, such as environmentalists and consumers, will try to saddle government agencies and the policy implementation apparatus with mechanisms that reduce the agency's ability to carry out its mandate but also protect it from future interference. Importantly, however, these cases are outliers, since the groups behind these policies were traditionally out of power and act based on a temporary hold on public authority. The models above, however, provide a more general understanding of the relationship between electoral competition and policy insulation. In what follows, therefore, I offer two examples that illustrate these results. Each case illustrates parts of the story that have been overlooked.

Trade Policy

The conclusion of the reciprocity game is that when political uncertainty is high, cooperation is easier to sustain, and when it is low, it is likely to be unsustainable, even when there are benefits for cooperation. The latter is precisely the case with tariff policy from the late nine-teenth century until the 1930s. 17 In this period, the Republicans were in control most of the time, although their control was not complete. Of the 30 Congresses from 1871 to 1931, although some elections were close, the Republicans had undivided control of both houses 18 times, the Democrats had undivided control five times, and control was divided seven times (U.S. Department of Commerce, Bureau of the Census 1975, 1083). Because policies survived until there was undivided government, this division of political institutions meant that Republican policies were in place more than 80% of the time, while Democratic policies were in place less than 20% of the time.

The two parties' positions on tariffs were clearly articulated: The Republicans preferred protectionist policies; the Democrats wanted open domestic markets. In this case, with a low degree of political uncertainty, the two sides were unable to coordinate on a cooperative solution. Instead, each side, when in power, either reduced or increased tariffs. As Epstein and O'Halloran (1996, 303) describe, "... [T]ariffs changed regularly in roller-coaster fashion when a new party entered office. High tariffs were followed by low tariffs, which were succeeded by high tariffs. The tariff acts of 1883, 1890, 1894, 1897, 1912, 1922, and 1930 were passed close on the heels of federal elections, with each peak in the tariff rate associated with Republican control and each trough with Democratic control."18 To understand U.S. tariff policy, Epstein and O'Halloran consider it necessary to take account of partisanship. As they conclude, "... [W] hen strong parties take divergent positions on an issue, changes in the preferences of the median voter that result in a new party taking office will lead to changes in policy outcomes above and beyond those explained by changes in the median voter alone. ... [C]oalitions will aggregate interests in different ways, implying that policy will be biased towards the coalitional base of the party in power" (Epstein and O'Halloran 1996, 302).

While demonstrating that partisan regime change is an important determinant of changes in tariff policy, Epstein and O'Halloran's argument is incomplete in ignoring what enabled this behavior. The results of the reciprocity game suggest that the low degree of uncertainty during this period interacted with partisan shifts to produce changes in tariff policy. It is possible to use the results in Propositions 1 and 2 to posit a counterfactual: If political uncertainty had been high, partisan changes would not have led to significant shifts in tariff policy.

The tariff case also illustrates the results from the insulation game. As mentioned, in the late nineteenth century and early twentieth century, the dominant Republican party would undo any reductions in tariffs made during infrequent periods of Democratic supremacy. When they again were in a position to legislate tariff policy in the 1930s, they faced a familiar problem: How would they make the changes more durable? They found an answer in the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act (RTAA) of 1934. As Bailey, Goldstein, and Weingast argue, the RTAA ceded control over tariff policy from Congress to the President. Given that presidents were more liberal on trade than legislators, the Democrats would ensure that tariffs would be lower than under the usual Republican Congresses. "... [B]y giving the President agenda-setting power, tariff cuts would be more extensive and durable even if congress were to be taken back by protectionist forces," they explain. "Even Republican Presidents, with their national constituencies, would be more liberal on trade than Republicans in Congress and could use their institutional power to constrain the protectionist impulses of Republicans in Congress" (Bailey, Goldstein, and Weingast 1997, 310).

Two features of this example are important, then, to illustrate the results from the IG. First, as predicted, an electorally weak party, the Democrats, was willing to bear the costs of insulating its agenda in return for a steadier stream of expected benefits. Perhaps more importantly, the dominant Republicans did not insulate their changes. They were more content to sabotage the Democratic programs when given the opportunity and to continue to implement their programs during their frequent times in power.

&lt;sup>17</sup> One important question is whether this was a zero-sum policy. Although tariff policy represents a single-dimensional policy choice, as I argue above, even in a single dimension, if there is sufficient risk aversion, there will be the possibility of gains from cooperation. In the case of trade policy, these gains almost certainly exist. Take, for example, the case of protected industries. If they adjust the capacity to a constantly changing tariff level, they will either incur significant fixed costs, which will be underutilized, or the benefit of the tariff will be unrealized, as the capacity will be below the optimal level. In this case, even though the tariff involves massive transfers, importers, exporters, and even consumers will place some value on policy stability at the expense of (part of) the distributive benefits and costs to the tariff. Further, even if this were a case in which the gains from cooperation are slight—in other words, the policy is close to zero-sum—the model would predict the same dynamics both when insulation was not yet a possibility and once insulation became possible.

Broadcast Radio Regulation

The origins of radio regulation in the United States also present a set of political conditions different from the cases examined in the literature, for radio regulation was demanded by a dominant, largely unopposed coalition. In this case, an administrative structure was erected that was less constrained but also subject to interference.

The two major pieces of legislation that created a formal administrative apparatus for radio regulation were the 1927 Radio Act, which created the Federal Radio Commission (FRC), and the 1934 Communications Act, which created the Federal Communications Commission (FCC). Prior to 1927, federal policy toward radio frequency regulation was governed by a series of legislative acts—the 1887 Interstate Commerce Act, 1910 Mann–Elkins Amendments to the Interstate Commerce Act, 1910 Wireless Ship Act, and 1912 Radio Act—that were designed for management of commercial shipping frequencies and not broadcasting.

With the emergence of broadcast radio, the courts began to rule against the applicability of previous legislation to management of the broadcast frequencies. In a series of court and executive decisions, it became increasingly clear that extant statutes would not be sufficient to manage the new technology (Emery 1971; McMahon 1979; Wollenberg 1989) This gap in the regulatory framework created a strong alignment of interests in the mid-1920s behind the creation of an agency to manage radio frequencies. The relatively unopposed coalition was led by existing or aspiring broadcasters, who saw regulation as a boon in two senses: On the one hand, it was sorely needed to eliminate negative externalities from congestion and lack of coordination; on the other hand, it promised to provide stations with a way to maintain a strong position in growing and potentially competitive markets.

Broadcasters who were demanding regulation had little to fear from opponents in either the short or the long term. In the short term, the growing disorganization of the industry, with no coordination, meant that all segments of interests were clamoring for the government to step in and more actively organize the use of the airwaves: Nascent broadcasters, listeners, religious groups, content providers, and commercial radio operators had a common and intense interest in overcoming congestion, interference, and the lack of coordination. Even in the future, consumer interests were unlikely to play much of a role, as they were largely unorganized. Alternatively, the broadcast industry was very quickly organizing, with the National Association of Broadcasters emerging as an important force driving the development of legislation in the four National Radio Conferences in the 1920s and 1930s.

The lack of opposition, a situation that was likely to hold for the foreseeable future, was reflected in the focus on efficiency rather than insulation. Almost all parties supported removing any jurisdiction from the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC), which was perceived as being more interested in other domains and lacking sufficient focus. Given that a separate regulatory agency was to be created, the question was how to structure its powers. This classic structural choice, however, was resolved in a way much different than the later debates over the organization of the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) or Consumer Product Safety Commission (CPSC). In this case, the agency was, in almost every area, given leeway, discretion, and a wide range of authority.

Rather than giving the FRC a highly specific statute to implement, in the 1927 Act "Congress turned essentially all radio regulation over to the new agency, whose discretion was limited mainly by a new requirement that its actions serve the public interest" (Wollenberg 1989, 65; see also Emery 1971, 45-49). Indeed, specific procedures that were considered but summarily discarded highlight the nature of this debate. An example of such an issue is how the commission's decisionmaking authority over licenses would be structured. One possibility was to house decisions over license appeals in the full body of the agency, which would have lessened the impact any single commissioner might have had on the implementation of policy. Instead, Congress arranged that each commissioner would have full authority over licensing decisions in five regional zones (U.S. Congress 1927, sec. 29). This enhanced the speed and efficiency with which licenses were granted, but it also made these decisions more susceptible to future appointments by potential rivals. This broad mandate meant that the period from 1927 to 1934 featured a sea change in the implementation of radio policy, primarily by a largely unfettered FRC (Wollenberg 1989, 68).

Seven years after the creation of the FRC, Congress passed the 1934 Communications Act. The Act was prompted by the desire to integrate regulation of all communications into a single agency. The 1927 Act had divided control over communications policy between the FRC, which regulated radio, and the ICC, which retained control over common carriage. The 1934 Act eliminated the FRC but transferred control over radio to the newly created FCC.

The broad discretion granted to the FRC in 1927 might have been altered in 1934, with the passage of the Communications Act; however, the procedural constraints on radio regulation remained muted, becoming more stringent only in some limited sense (Krasnow 1982). Title III of the 1934 Act, which governed the licensing of broadcast radio operators, added several provisions to the previous statute, but all were innocuous (Wollenberg 1989).

If anything, the 1934 Act maintained the bureaucracy's discretion while expanding its reach. Under the same discretion as before; the FCC was to have the authority to suspend or revoke the license of any operator (U.S. Congress 1934, sec. 303(m)). Similarly, section 302 of the Act included additional rule-making powers for the FCC to govern chain broadcasting, again with no constraint on the agency's interpretation or implementation except that it be in the public interest. More generally, the issue of the extent of judicial review was also debated as a potential constraint on the agency. During hearings about the Act, several radio broadcasters who had had their licenses revoked objected to the limited extent of review and appeal granted in the 1927 Act (Cass 1989, 86-87; U.S. Congress, Senate Hearings 1934, 56–57). Ultimately, review powers were very limited, as Congress decided to limit the courts and leave discretion to the agency. Further, the Act provided strong discretionary powers for enforcement, allowing for fines and penalties, in addition to revocation of licenses. The use of these powers was left largely to the FCC's discretion. In the end, the main limitation on the FCC was, as with the 1927 Act, a stricture to regulate in the "public interest." This broad standard meant that the agency was granted considerable discretion to manage licenses and promulgate regulations.

The history of early regulation of radio broadcasting shows what happens when enacting groups enjoy more than a "moment in the sun." In both the 1927 Radio Act and the 1934 Communications Act, regulation was initiated not by such a constellation of interests, but by groups that did not fear loss of power in the future. The result was legislation that culminated with an agency enabled to act on its own. As Cass (1989, 90) notes, "The Commission's capacity to shape policy in a manner that responds to changing circumstances and shifting interests is further advanced by the broadly worded authority delegated to the Commission in Titles II and III and by the limited scope of judicial review available."19 Relaxed procedural and jurisdictional control was made possible precisely by the absence of any fear that the agency would be captured in the future by opposing interests.

DISCUSSION

Structural choices are crucial to both interest groups and legislators. These choices, are made in a process of strategic interactions between players set in an institutional context. The existing literature on treatments of these choices is at once instructive and incomplete: Political uncertainty, under certain conditions, can lead to bureaucratic inefficiency, but this occurs only to a point. In many cases, political uncertainty actually discourages inefficient insulation of public policy.

The analysis and examples provided here help, therefore, to clarify unexplored aspects of this literature. In thinking about policy insulation, electoral strength, and not uncertainty, should be seen as the determinative factor. Those with the most to gain by giving up benefits now in exchange for benefits in the future—either through policy cooperation, when insulation is not available, or through costly structural means, when it is—are precisely the groups that will have the least capacity to do so. Accordingly, the claim that bureaucracy is "inefficient by design" must be tempered. For costly insulation to take place, groups must have both the motive and the means. The analysis shows that in most cases, when players have the means—when they are elected frequently—they do not have the incentive to use it, and when they have the motive, they do not have the opportunity to act on their incentives.

More generally, the models illustrate one role of electoral volatility. Frequent turnover among elected officials, depending on the policy in question, can lead to greater cooperation. The critical mechanism that leads to such cooperation is the employment of punishment strategies. Players whose electoral fates are uncertain are more willing to take conciliatory postures toward their opponents when they believe that they will soon have to cede authority to opposing groups. Although I focus on a particular context for reciprocity—the structural choices by interest groups—the implications of my analysis extend beyond this application to general theories of democratic representation and policy implementation. Both models suggest a potentially important avenue of research: the nature and manifestations of reciprocity emerging from democratic institutions.

Finally, an important question in the literature on political institutions concerns the sources of policy stability. Though not comprehensive, the theory developed here posits three processes that can generate stability, albeit in much different ways. First, when policy insulation is not a viable alternative, either because it is not durable, as in parliamentary systems, or because it is extremely costly, stability can occur through cooperation when groups' power is evenly divided. Second, when insulation is not available and the groups are not cooperating, it is likely that one group is dominant. In this case, policies will still be stable, although not as stable as with reciprocity, because one group will be able to impose its policies consistently. Finally, when insulation is available to players, groups that are historically dominant in the electoral arena will not insulate their policies. But since they are in power often, they will be able to maintain the continuity of their policies. Groups that are disadvantaged electorally will insulate their policies, in those occasional political moments when they do rise to control the public apparatus. So although they are infrequently in power, their policies will be stable as well, albeit less effectively implemented.

APPENDIX: PROOFS OF RESULTS

Proof of Proposition 1. In this case, one must only analyze a subgame in which the other player has moved. For A, its choice at any point is whether or not to play O, given B's strategy. Given that the choice at the first stage is identical to that at later stages, one must consider only the first opportunity to overturn. Since B is playing grim trigger, if A plays O, then its expected payoff is

$$EU_A(A_A = O) = 1 + \frac{\delta \gamma}{1 - \delta} = \frac{1 - \delta + \delta \gamma}{1 - \delta}.$$
 (1)

Note that I suppress the subscript t and the conditioning on  $s_B$ . If A plays NO, however, for all t, its expected payoff is

$$EU_A(A_A = NO) = \frac{\beta}{1 - \delta}.$$

Thus, A will cooperate if and only if (2) is greater than (1). Thus, A cooperates if and only if $$\beta > 1 - \delta + \delta \gamma = \beta_A^* \tag{3a}$$

By symmetry and substituting  $1 - \gamma$  for  $\gamma_1$ , B will cooperate if and only if

$$\beta > 1 - \delta \gamma = \beta_B^*. \tag{3b}$$

Since cooperation is sustained only if both players do not have an incentive to play O, and both (3a) and (3b) are lower bounds, I therefore can define a condition such that cooperation can be sustained:  $\beta > \max(\beta_A^, \beta_B^) = \beta^$ . The proposition follows from the fact that  $\beta^$  is a function of  $\delta$  and  $\gamma$ .

Proof of Proposition 2. Solving for the maximum condition given in Proposition 1, I obtain the following:

$$eta^* = egin{cases} 1 - \delta + \delta \gamma & & if & \gamma > rac{1}{2}, \ 1 - \delta \gamma & & if & \gamma < rac{1}{2}. \end{cases}$$

The proposition follows from the fact that  $\beta^*$  is a decreasing function of  $\gamma$  if  $\gamma < 0.5$  and increasing if  $\gamma > 0.5$ .<sup>20</sup>

Proof of Proposition 3a. To solve for the equilibrium conditions, we again employ the concepts of subgame perfection. Although the insulation choice is a one-shot play, the overturn-not overturn decision is infinitely repeated. We are evaluating the equilibrium under grim trigger strategies, so each player must choose from the action set  $A'_{ij} = \{(I, O); (I, NO); (NI, O); (NI, NO)\}^{21}$ . To find the conditions under which a particular set of strategies is an equilibrium, we evaluate the four potential strategy combinations, having fixed the equilibrium strategy of the other player.

To find the conditions under which both players insulate, we evaluate  $\{(I, O); (I, O)\}$ . Initially, we evaluate when (I, O) is a best response for A given that B is playing (I, O). Note first that if B plays (I, O), (I, O) weakly dominates (I, NO) and strictly dominates (NI, NO) for A. Thus we must compare the expected payoffs for A from (I, O) and (NI, O). If A plays (I, O), its expected payoff is given by

$$= \frac{\alpha\gamma(1-\beta)}{1-\delta\gamma} + \frac{\alpha\beta}{1-\delta} - \frac{\alpha\beta(1-\gamma)}{1-\delta+\delta\gamma}.$$
(4)

Similarly, if A plays (NI, O), its expected payoff is

$$EU_{A}(A'_{At} = \{(NI, O)\} | A'_{Bt} = \{(I, O)\})$$

$$= \frac{\gamma(1-\beta)}{1-\delta \nu} + \frac{\beta \gamma}{1-\delta}.$$
(5)

Solving for the conditions under which (4) is greater than (5) yields $$\alpha > \frac{(1 - \delta + \delta \gamma)(1 - \delta + \beta \delta(1 - \gamma))}{1 - \delta((2 - \delta)(1 - \beta(1 - \gamma)) - \gamma(1 - \delta)} = \alpha_A^*.$$

Thus, if (6) holds, then A's best response to B's playing (I, O) is (I, O). From the symmetry of the game form and payoffs, we can derive the condition under which B's best response to A's playing (I, O) is (I, O) by substituting  $(1 - \gamma)$  for  $\gamma$  in (6). We call this cut point  $\alpha_B^$ . Since  $\alpha$  must be greater than both  $\alpha_A^$  and  $\alpha_B^$ , we have the result:  $\{(I, O); (I, O)\}$  is an equilibrium,  $\alpha > \max(\alpha_A^, \alpha_B^) = \alpha^$ , which is the proposition.

Proof of Proposition 3b. Consider first that  $\alpha < \alpha_B^*$ . Then from the proof of Proposition 3a above, we have that, given that A plays (I, O), B's best response is  $(NI, \odot)$ , so B will not insulate even if A does. We must then compare the expected payoff for A from playing (I, O) versus (NI, O) given that B plays  $(NI, \odot)$ .

If A plays (I, O), its expected payoff is given by

$$EU_{A}(A'_{At} = \{(I, O)\}|A'_{Bt} = \{(NI, O)\})$$

Similarly, if A plays (NI, O), its expected payoff is

$$EU_A(A'_{At} = \{(I, O)\}|A'_{Bt} = \{(NI, O)\}) = \frac{\gamma}{1 - \delta}.$$
 (8)

Solving for the conditions under which (7) is greater than (8) yields

$$\alpha > \frac{1 - \delta + \delta \gamma}{1 - \delta + \delta \gamma + \delta \beta (1 - \gamma)} = \alpha_A^{}. \tag{9}$$

Thus, if  $\alpha < \alpha_B^$  and (9) holds, then A will insulate, while B will not. By substituting  $(1 - \gamma)$  for  $\gamma$ , we can derive a similar result in which B will insulate and A will not if  $\alpha < \alpha_A^$ .

$$\alpha > \frac{1 - \delta \gamma}{1 - \delta \gamma + \delta \beta \gamma} = \alpha_B^{}. \tag{10}$$

Equations (9) and (10) constitute the proposition.

Proof of Proposition 3c. This follows directly from conditions (9) and (10) above. If  $\alpha < \alpha_A^{}$ , then playing NI is the best response for A if B plays NI. Similarly, if  $\alpha < \alpha_B^{}$ , then NI is a best response for B given that A plays NI. Thus if  $\alpha < \min(\alpha_A^{}, \alpha_B^{})$ , then both players playing NI will be an equilibrium. Further, from Proposition 1, we have a condition under which, given that players are playing  $\{(NI, \odot), (NI, \odot)\}$ , they will overturn if and only if  $\beta < \beta^*$ . Thus, depending on the value of  $\beta$ , the players that are not insulating will play either O or NO.

Proof of Proposition 4. To see this consider the conditions given in Propositions 3a through 3c. First note that from Proposition 3a, we have both players insulating if and only if $$\alpha > \alpha^* = \begin{cases} \alpha_B^* & if & \gamma < \frac{1}{2}, \\ \alpha_A^* & if & \gamma > \frac{1}{2}. \end{cases}$$

 (11)

Taking the first derivative of (11), we obtain the following result:

$$\frac{\partial \alpha^*}{\partial \gamma} \begin{cases} < 0 & \text{if } \gamma < \frac{1}{2}, \\ > 0 & \text{if } \gamma > \frac{1}{2}. \end{cases}$$

<sup>21</sup> Implicitly, we are evaluating equilibria in which if a player does not want to overturn in the first turn, it will not do so afterward.

From Proposition 3c, we analyze the behavior of cut points  $\alpha_A^{}$  and  $\alpha_B^{}$ . From (9), we analyze  $\alpha_A^{}$  for  $\gamma$  less than 0.5:

$$\frac{\partial \alpha_A^{}}{\partial \gamma} = \frac{\delta \beta}{(1 - \delta + \delta \gamma + \delta \beta (1 - \gamma))^2} > 0.$$

Similarly, if  $\gamma$  is greater than 0.5, we examine  $\alpha_B^{}$ :

$$\frac{\partial \alpha_B^{}}{\partial \gamma} = \frac{-\delta \beta}{(1 - \delta \gamma + \delta \beta \gamma)^2} < 0.$$

Equations (12), (13), and (14), constitute the proposition.

Bureaucracy that Kills: Federal Sovereign Immunity and the Discretionary Function Exception

WILLIAM G. WEAVER University of Texas at El Paso THOMAS LONGORIA University of Kansas

Political scientists normally discuss sovereign immunity in the context of international law and relations. The domestic effects of sovereign immunity are almost never examined, even though those effects are profound and implicate a range of issues of interest to political scientists. The Federal Tort Claims Act (FCTA) (1946) is a main waiver of federal sovereign immunity and is designed to allow people injured by government employees to sue for money damages. The FTCA has a number of exceptions, the most prominent of which is known as the "discretionary function exception." This exception retains sovereign immunity for the United States when a federal employee acts "based upon the exercise or performance or the failure to exercise or perform a discretionary function or duty...whether or not the discretion involved be abused." This simple exception expanded into a comprehensive tool of government that now confounds justice and federal governmental accountability.

n April 16, 1947, a ship anchored in the harbor of Texas City, the Grandcamp, exploded, leveling most of the city, killing 576 people, and injuring five thousand more. Destined for Europe as part of the Marshall Plan, the Grandcamp had more than 1,850 tons of fertilizer grade ammonium nitrate (FGAN) aboard, along with a heavy load of commercial explosives. When the captain of the Grandcamp saw smoke coming from a hold of the ship, he ordered the hatches battened and injected steam into the cargo area to quell the fire. This was normal procedure for fires in holds, but unfortunately those administering the fertilizer program neglected to warn the captain that FGAN is an oxidizing agent and does not need any external oxygen for combustion. The heat and the pressure created by the spontaneous combustion, the steam, and the battened hold caused the FGAN to explode.

Federally owned munitions factories that less than two years before the disaster had been turning out ordnance to be dropped on Europe now manufactured fertilizer to be spread on its fields. A private company would have been liable for the damage and injury caused by the explosions, but the United States escaped liability through a little-known provision of the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) (1946). The government had the FGAN bagged at extremely high temperatures, usually 200°F (Dalehite v. U.S. 1952 [hereafter Dalehite], 40), and administrators knew perfectly well the dangerous propensities of the fertilizer and about incidents of FGAN undergoing spontaneous combustion and exploding (66–7). Even more, there were no warnings on the fertilizer bags, and stevedores, cargo masters, and ship captains were not informed about the properties of FGAN. Most telling, administrators halted safety testing of the fertilizer when contract laboratories told them that, under procedures adopted by the government, it looked as if the FGAN would pose substantial danger to the public (66).

The Discretionary Function Exception (DFE) (FTCA 1946, sec. 2680(a)) to the FTCA protects the federal government from liability when policy decisions or actions of agencies or employees injure people. Growing out of the doctrines of sovereign immunity and separation of powers, the exception specifically applies "whether or not the discretion involved be abused." In Dalehite, the DFE saw its first use to protect the U.S. Government from liability, and it succeeded magnificently, turning out to be just the beginning in a long train of success. The DFE gives rise to several important and interesting questions concerning its scope and use. But beyond these matters, it provides a concrete example for examining contending understandings of the role of judges in controlling bureaucracy, influencing policy formulation, and bringing administrators to account for their actions.

Debates over judicial control of bureaucracy are contentious and long-standing. In the 1950s and 1960s a small but influential group of scholars sought diverse means to limit administrative discretion and independence. This group included Henry Friendly (1962), Walter Gellhorn and Clark Byse (1974), Louis Jaffe, Kenneth Culp Davis, and others, but Jaffe and Davis are perhaps the most important authors for the present concerns

In Judicial Control of Administrative Action, Jaffe (1965) presented a powerful view of the relationship between courts and administrators. He reacted against New Deal antijuridical views of public administration theorists, who believed that "if any person is to count for less than one . . . it is the lawyer" and that the lawyer suffered from a "meager social outlook," representing "everything stultifying" (Waldo 1948, 79). To these New Deal theorists, in administrative agencies "thoroughly motored and controlled by rational elaboration," judicial review and incursion into the sphere of the administrator were not only disruptive but also unjust (Jaffe 1973, 1186). Born in this crucible of antilegalism, the DFE first appeared in proposed legislation in 1942 (H.R. 6463), to help prevent what some commentators referred to as judicial "sabotage of the administrative process" (Blachly and Oatman 1946, 213). Testifying concerning this bill, an assistant attorney general asserted that the DFE preserved administrative autonomy to conduct "legally authorized activity" and protected agencies against "alleged abuse of discretionary authority" (U.S. Congress, House 1942, 33). The exception, therefore, is steeped in the counterjuridical impulse of New Deal administrative theory and is a vestige of an exuberant faith in administrative expertise.

Against the New Deal impulse, Jaffe implored judges to take a "hard look" approach to administrative decision-making. In piquant language, he noted that historically judges have been "adept...at removing the hide of an administrative agency" and that the "glint of the scalpel is still detectable behind the voluminous folds of [judges'] robes" (Jaffe 1965, 565). Judicial surgery on administrative agencies is precisely what Jaffe was after, and to achieve this he had to discredit the tendency to deference adopted by judges when reviewing administrative decisions. He saw judicial review of agency action as the necessary moral countervailing force to the scientism of administration theory and stated that "the touchstone of rejecting an administrative decision is the sense of the judge that it is unfair" (Jaffe 1951, 1245). And he termed the New Deal sentiment that agencies should be free of judicial "sabotage" a "heresy" (1259).

Davis likewise authored powerful tracts arguing for control of administrative power, but he focused more narrowly than Jaffe on the mechanics of discretion and disfavored the cumbersome, formalized process of court review of administrative action. Davis (1969, v) saw that injustice at the hands of administrators is directly proportional to the amount of discretion floating free in agencies. He believed that earlier efforts to eliminate or severely constrict administrative discretion actually achieved the opposite result (27–51) and that courts should not try to control discretion directly, but to channel legislators and administrators into avenues of effective rulemaking (220–1). Judicial review in America is too geared to large interests, and the transaction costs of going to court mean that "the system frequently fails to take care of parties with small interests" (155). By "parties with small interests," Davis meant poor, helpless, and troubled people. With appropriate planning and distribution of discretion, these are precisely the sorts of interests that administrators are most effective at serving. The problem, Davis said, is not so much providing substantial discretion to administrators, but how intelligently to circumscribe discretionary power and make sure only the optimal amount of discretion for performance of mandated functions is in the hands of agencies. Our system, Davis said, is in "imbalance"; it is "saturated with excessive discretionary power which needs to be confined, structured, and checked" (27).

More recently, some theorists have gone further than Davis, keeping the opposition to New Deal administrative theory, but embracing New Deal antilegalism in formulating solutions to problems of agency control. These thinkers believe that oversight of administrators need not come from courts; "judicial participation in the administrative process is not indispensable" (Krent 1997, 1187), and though the impulse to "exercise review over discretionary administrative action is understandable, the consequences can be perverse" (1189). But the DFE often arises when administrative incentives are at their worst. Because it provides a shield not only from liability, but also often from discovery, there is an incentive to employ the exception to avoid embarrassment and disclosure of information that would trigger action adverse to agency interests. The DFE is at odds with the work of both Jaffe and Davis, for it frequently protects administrators and their agencies when they wield their discretion most unwisely or even maliciously.

The FTCA can be a powerful tool for controlling agency discretion. As Rosenbloom (2001) notes, it is one of several steps taken by Congress in 1946 to redefine the relationship among Congress, the judiciary, and the bureaucracy in the postwar era. This "legislativecentered" view of public administration acknowledges that administration has legislative functions, that agencies serve as extensions of Congress, that administration should be informed by political authority, and that Congress has oversight and supervisory roles. This view also acknowledges not only that the president and political appointees are charged with day-to-day implementation of statutorily authorized functions, but also that administrators have discretion to formulate action where Congress has not provided explicit direction (Rosenbloom 2001, 776). Significant in Rosenbloom's perspective is that Congress, at a time when it attempted to reclaim control over the bureaucracy, sought to transfer responsibility for determining governmental liability to the judiciary. Rosenbloom (2001, 776), from a largely normative position, argues that it is the primary role of the federal courts to "provide judicial review of agency actions" to prevent the exercise of discretion Congress intended to prohibit. On this view, the FTCA not only transferred determination of federal governmental tort liability to the judiciary, but also sought to make the judiciary partners with Congress in oversight of administrative action.

As discussed more thoroughly below, one of the reasons Congress moved to abandon the private bill system is that it was inefficient. It is generally unwise, though, to rely on federal courts to resolve disputes between citizens and government effectively, and it may not be reasonable in light of weaknesses identified in the judicial branch in areas of policymaking. Effective policymaking requires capacities such as technical expertise and the ability to conduct long-range planning and public policy analysis that facilitate effective implementation, capacities that courts do not possess (Rosenberg 1991, 20). As Rosenberg observes, the efficacy of judicial action is questioned even in areas normally thought to be exemplary instances of the federal courts as effective promoters of social and policy change:

areas such as civil rights, voting rights, and women's rights (20).

Rosenberg's "constrained court" perspective is well supported by evidence and forces a balanced approach to understanding the policymaking role of federal courts vis-à-vis other branches of government. However, in the case of the DFE, the issue is not about whether judges can effect broad social change by taking on roles as policymakers. In cases where the DFE is raised, the courts are playing a role that they are accustomed to and very well equipped to fulfill. The claims are taken to the courts on relatively narrow legal grounds, the decisions rendered by the courts do not require ongoing enforcement and oversight, and such decisions do not directly alter agency policy and practice. And while the speed, efficiency, and narrow focus of court action are ongoing concerns, suits under the FTCA are usually the only remedy available to citizens harmed by the government.

The DFE is at war with justice, and the question is who should be in the fight. Although judicial control of bureaucracy presents many intractable problems and dangers, we believe that the courts should construe the DFE narrowly, far more narrowly than at present, to maximize judicial review of administrative action. We argue this for several reasons. First, the FTCA substantially commits oversight of administrative action for injuries caused to citizens to the judiciary. Second, when the DFE is raised it is often in cases where great harms have been committed and administrators are trying to avoid embarrassment or disclosure of revealing information about policies and procedures. In such cases, oversight cannot be left to the agencies, and it is dubious to depend on congressional intervention. Third, by their very nature, FTCA cases concern injuries inflicted on citizens at the hands of government. Determination of legal liability for tortious conduct is one of the most common and routinized activities in the legal system, and courts are extremely adept at adjudicating such cases. Here the courts are on sure footing compared to that in administrative oversight cases arising under other statutes that entangle the judiciary more deeply in agency action. Fourth, finding liability under the FTCA is not a direct review of agency policy and practice; no court tells an agency to change a policy or procedure or adopt new standards. When the court finds liability, it, at worst, forces the offending agency administrators to make a calculation of whether to maintain the policy or action that caused the injuries or to make changes. This decision is left to the agency and not the court. Finally, we note that FTCA cases are generally "large interest," rather than Davis's "small interest," cases and, therefore, presumably more amenable to legal resolution.

The DFE is an anachronism sandwiched into an ideal. On the one hand, the FTCA represents a landmark in governmental acceptance of responsibility and efforts to reduce injustice. On the other hand, the DFE and other exceptions to liability in the FTCA are vestiges of an age of credulous faith in the expert administrator. Congress passed the FTCA on the cusp between two eras, between the twilight of New Deal faith in the expert agency and the bare beginnings of an era of profound distrust of administrative discretion; the FTCA reflects both of these eras.

It is also important to know if the DFE is having a substantial effect on our constitutional system and on means of governmental accountability. Although broadened by the FTCA, the exception performs a crucial function in our constitutional system and has long been held by federal courts to be implied in the Constitution. As Justice Marshall observed in Marbury v. Madison (1803, 170), "The province of the court is, solely, to decide on the rights of individuals, not to enquire how the executive, or executive officers, perform duties in which they have a discretion."

Where the DFE applies, there is no remedy for governmental abuse, regardless of its seriousness. Indeed, the greater the injury inflicted by the government, the more likely the DFE will be proffered to the courts to immunize agencies, employees, and the United States from liability (Axelrad 2000). To give some idea of the breadth of the DFE, it immunizes the government for the following.

- Allegedly hiding knowledge of a murder by an inmate, securing the inmate's release, and then misleading state law enforcement authorities as he kills five additional people (Taitt v. U.S. 1983).
- Placing a known embezzler in the Witness Protection Program and allowing him to become CEO of a publicly held company, even though he is currently under investigation for defrauding another publicly held company. He steals $1.5 million (Jet Industries, Inc. v. U.S. 1984).
- The CIA setting up a dummy investment corporation, placing a known swindler in charge of the organization who then, with government knowledge, bilks private investors out of millions of dollars (Frigard v. U.S. 1988).
- The exposure of military and civilian personnel to pesticides, botulinum toxin, and unapproved vaccines without their knowledge, causing birth defects in children born to exposed parents (Minns v. U.S. 1997).
- Knowingly exposing thousands of employees, military personnel, and private citizens to ionizing radiation, failing to inform or warn the victims of their exposure, and using them as "guinea pigs" in long range studies of the effects of radiation exposure (Allen v. U.S. 1987; Consolidated Atmospheric Testing, in re 1987).
- Conducting a simulated biological attack on an unwarned, unsuspecting San Francisco public utilizing bacteria that causes death and injury (Nevin v. U.S. 1983).
- Cremation and acid reduction of stolen bodies or body parts for radiation assay and study without the permission or knowledge of relatives.<sup>1</sup>

The list could go on at quite some length. Despite its consequences, the DFE is unaccountably ignored by political scientists and is mentioned only occasionally, usually in connection with international law and the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (Evans 1980, 951; Falk 1965, 778; Leigh 1987, 949; Semmelman 1993, 290–2). This is odd, since many issues central to political science are implicated by the DFE: issues concerning judicial oversight of administrative decisions, separation of powers, governmental accountability, intrusion into the peace and dignity of citizens, and justice. To start out, it will be helpful to sketch a history of sovereign immunity as it relates to our analysis.

FROM "THE KING CAN DO NO WRONG" TO "THE ADMINISTRATOR CAN DO NO WRONG"

Historically, tyrannies and democracies alike frequently refused to be legally accountable for the wrongs committed by their officials. But governmental immunity from legal action in a democracy, where the people are sovereign, presents special problems. In the United States, efforts to address these problems began in the first Congress. In discussing whether a comptroller of accounts should be empowered to hear and "adjust" claims against the United States, James Madison thought that people turned down by the comptroller should have a "right to petition the Supreme Court for redress, and they should be empowered to do right therein; this will enable [them] to carry [their] claim before an independent tribunal" (Debates and Proceedings in the Congress of the United States, 1, [1965], 612).

Sovereign immunity is one of the few areas of law that remains undisturbed in a slumber of pre-Revolutionary War theory. It is as absolute today in the United States as it was in the England of George III, though the justifications for it have changed. The King and Queen were ultra vires, extrajudicial, and so could not be sued without their consent. Blackstone made this point succinctly in his well-known statement: "[B]esides the attribute of sovereignty the law also ascribes to the king, in his political capacity, absolute perfection. The king can do no wrong" (Ehrlich 1959, 67). And as Pollock and Maitland ([1895] 1968, 516) observe, "If Henry III had been capable of being sued, he would have passed his life as a defendant." Sovereign immunity extended to government officials, and discretionary acts by administrators in conformance with the Crown's desires or policies have always been protected. This extension of immunity to the discretionary functions of administrators acting within the scope and authorization of their duties served several important purposes.

First, it prevented elliptical attacks on the Crown's policies and desires by protecting those charged with snatching"). Some 15 thousand bodies were mutilated or stolen under this program (Philadelphia Enquirer 1995; Welsome 1998, 299–304). Though, amazingly, apparently no suits were filed over Project Sunshine activities, it seems likely that the government would raise the DFE as a defense in such an event.

their execution. A wronged or injured subject might sue the administrator who caused the injury, but courts would suspend judgment unless the King or Queen specifically disclaimed the act of the administrator. If the Crown claimed the act as its own, the administrator was absolutely immune from legal action. By the time of James I, efforts to close off access to legal redress for injured subjects increased. For example, the prefatory statement to a 1609 statute designed to discourage suits against officers begins with the observation that "many causeless and contentious suits... have been and daily are commenced [by] evil-disposed, contentious persons... [and these suits are a] hindrance to efficient administration" (Jaffe 1963, 10).

Second, if administrators, or those being recruited for administrative positions, know that their decisions will not place them at peril in suit, they are more likely to accept government employment and to discharge their duties more effectively. Administrators left unprotected may make decisions based on their own perceived risks, rather than in accord with their defined duties

Finally, the extension of sovereign immunity to the actions of administrators safeguards the public treasury from predation by means of damage awards. As bureaucracy expanded with the reach of the British Empire, so too did the number and severity of injuries caused by governmental policies. Without immunity, government and its administrators would have been subject to enormous damages.

Nevertheless, a number of practices arose that allowed suit both against the King or Queen eo nomine and against the Crown's officers. Beginning as early as the reign of Edward I, the Crown made itself amenable to suit in many circumstances (Jaffe 1963, 3). The King and Queen, though, usually retained their immunity from liability for the delicts of their servants, and public administrators were not vicariously liable for the actions of their employees. This doctrine is reaffirmed time and again throughout English history, and a major effort to overthrow it failed in 1865 (Feather v. Queen). The effect of these rules was to secure administrators and policies from judicial oversight and intrusion.

This view of sovereignty and the grant of immunity to administrators leaped the Atlantic and set up firmly in U.S. law. In the United States, with the framing of the Constitution an effort ensued to define the U.S. Government clearly as a robust, unitary sovereign. Hamilton, for example, in Federalist 81, wrote that "it is inherent in the nature of sovereignty not to be amenable to the suit of an individual without its consent" (Madison, James, Alexander Hamilton, and John Jay [1788] 1961, 487). And Chisholm v. Georgia (1793), Cohens v. Virginia (1821), McCulloch v. Maryland (1819), and other cases pressed this issue, with greater or lesser success. As John P. Roche (1961, 801) famously noted, increasing the power of the sovereign was eminently practical under the circumstances of the founding: "In politics there are no immaculate conceptions, and ... our very survival in the Hobbesian jungle of world politics depended upon a reordering and strengthening of our natural sovereignty."

Though present from the Founding, the U.S. Supreme Court explicitly embraced the doctrine of sovereign immunity in 1821, when it noted that "[i]t is an axiom in politics, that a sovereign and independent State is not liable to the suit of any individual" (Cohens v. Virginia 1821). And in 1907, Justice Holmes gave a famous and succinct, if unsatisfactory, logical justification for sovereign immunity: "[O]n...logical and practical ground[s]...there can be no legal right as against the authority that makes the law on which the right depends" (Kawananakoa v. Polyblank 1907, 353). But from the beginning, the Republic shifted with discomfort over the consequences sovereign immunity and unchecked administrative discretion could bring down on its citizens. In Poindexter v. Greenhow (1885, 291), Justice Matthews, writing for the Court, lamented,

Of what avail are written constitutions whose bills of right for the security of individual liberty have been written, too often, with the blood of martyrs shed upon the battle-field and the scaffold, if their limitations and restraints upon power may be overpassed with impunity by the very agencies created and appointed to guard, defend, and enforce them.... The doctrine is not to be tolerated.

Despite discomfort with the unitary theory of the federal sovereign, the theory survived more or less intact until the later years of the nineteenth century. Increasingly, though, commentators derided the government's refusal to grant legal relief for people it injured. In the latter portion of the nineteenth and beginnings of the twentieth centuries, political scientists and others began to attack the traditional view of sovereignty. In 1893, Ernst Freund subjected the unitary doctrine to withering analysis. Freund (1893, 638) noted that "there are evidently cases where justice demands the adjudication of rights against the state, while the logic of the law apparently forbids it." He thought that this apparent conflict makes sense only if the state is viewed as a unitary sovereign, which he thought to be a dangerously simplistic view: "The state is an exceedingly complex organism, and its functions are widely divergent.... The concentration of these various functions in one power would be impossible without a separation of organs" (638). Freund suggested that the regulative effects of liability would act as a check on governmental activity (647–8). These effects could be especially important in the face of governmental expansion and more attenuated control of administrative departments by the president.

One of the chief rationales for sovereign immunity is found in the sovereign's supervisory responsibilities in protecting the lives and properties of its subjects. The sovereign needs to be free to act in the public good without constant legal harassment that drains public coffers and diverts resources to nonproductive work. Given the multiplicity of activities and the complexity of the federal government's interaction with its citizens and others, it is clear that oversight of activity has been a major challenge to elected officials and presidentially appointed administrators for well over a century (Bibby 1966; Calvert, McCubbins, and Weingast 1989; Carpenter 1996). In the face of growing difficulties in maintaining control over bureaucracy, Freund's analysis suggests that citizens could in effect regulate government policy and practice through lawsuits and money damages, discouraging administrators from undertaking misdeeds.

Others were less elegant than Freund-but just as vehement, deriding sovereign immunity as an "antiquated relic" of a "barbarous and monistic rationalism" (Elliott 1925, 476) and stating that "the case against 'the discredited state' is one whose strength cannot and ought not to be underestimated" (491). These sentiments echoed John Dewey, Mary Parker Follett (1919), and other pragmatist thinkers, who saw sovereignty as "a more or less shapeless wish, except as it finds expression in organized institutions" (Dewey 1894, 43). Despite these assaults, at the dawn of the twentieth century the U.S. Government was no more accountable for the wrongful behavior of its administrators who hurt citizens than was the crown of England. In the mounting pressure to rethink sovereign immunity, the federal courts began to look favorably on actions against government officials for equitable relief. Federal officials were in theory subject to equitable action from the beginning of the Republic, but the U.S. Supreme Court extended this relief to allow for federally enforceable injunctive relief against state officials (Young, ex Parte 1908). This leniency toward equitable actions followed the English tradition exemplified in Rookes Case (1599, 210), which held that the use of administrative "discretion is a science...and not to [be used] according to [administrators'] wills and private affections." But the decision in Rookes did not concern money damages, and it is clear that this holding would not apply where the remedy is a judgment against the crown treasury.

One of the chief means, of course, of bringing the U.S. Government to account is through injunctive relief, as in the school desegregation and voting rights cases. But there are important occasions when equitable remedies are useless to secure a person's rights against the federal government. On such occasions money damages from a suit in tort may provide the only means of bringing the government and its administrators to account for their actions. Along with enforcement of criminal laws, the primary legal means for controlling behavior in our society is through the application and threat of application of monetary liability.

Because organizations tend to act in more predictable and rational ways than do people, the threat of tort liability is often an effective deterrent to undesirable behavior (Calabresi 1970; Coase 1960; Landes and Posner 1987). Administrators and officers in organizations and institutions almost universally consider potential liability in tort before undertaking policies, producing products, or engaging in activities. This comprehensive reach of tort liability is comparatively recent and tracks the growth in complexity and size of our market-based economy and the products it produces. But efforts to make the federal government accountable in the form of tort liability have repeatedly stumbled on the arcane but vigorous doctrine of sovereign immunity. Additionally, Congress's consistent unwillingness to visit the issue of federal liability except in specific, well-publicized cases foiled hopes of diminishing the domestic effects of sovereign immunity.

Mass compensation schemes by Congress are modern remedies, and up until the passage of the FTCA in 1946, the principal method the federal government used to handle liability claims was the "private bill" system. For most of the history of the United States, claims against the states and the federal government were not statutorily authorized but were handled through legislative committees. This process distracted legislators from their duty to work on behalf of all their constituents and often resulted in great injustice or justice delayed for years, or even decades. As one member of Congress noted in 1878, "There are just claims which have been before the Congress for half a century, and been favorably considered in one Congress by one house, and in another Congress by the other without ever having received that concurrent action in any Congress necessary to determine them" (U.S. Congress, House 1878, 2). This system also had the effect of preventing judicial oversight of administrative action that caused injury to citizens. Despite the nuisance and injustice caused by the private bill system, Congress only reluctantly took steps to abandon the institution.

PRIVATE BILLS AND THE FEDERAL TORT CLAIMS ACT

The use of private bills to compensate people injured or killed by governmental actions proved to be unwieldy, expensive, and unjust. In the first three U.S. Congresses alone, members introduced 2,317 private bills for relief (U.S. Congress, House 1848, 32). The Twenty-second, Twenty-third, and Twenty-fourth Congresses saw 8,655 private bills, with 603 passing both houses, making for a 7% success rate (32). An 1848 House report on private bills in the previous decade found that 16,573 bills were introduced in the House, 3,436 reported out of committee, with only 910 passing both houses; a 5.5% success rate (4). In the Seventy-sixth and Seventy-seventh Congresses, about four thousand bills were introduced and 908 approved, a success rate of about 23% (U.S. Congress, House 1945, 2).

While Congress was apparently reaching more bills by the time of these later sessions, it did so at great expense in time, money, and justice. Even as early as 1838, a House report complained that "members elected to participate in the examination and discussion of national subjects have devoted their time in the adjustment of private claims" (U.S. Congress, House 1838, 1). Nearly a century later, private bills still cut deeply into legislators' time (U.S. Congress, House 1942, 9–10).

Frequently, the investigative and review committees for private bills were composed of a single member, and disagreements between members of Congress affected the passage of claims for relief. Under the private bill system, justice "awaits upon political considerations or the popularity of a Congressman or the influence of a Senator" (U.S. Congress, House 1942, 51). John Quincy Adams opined, "There ought to be no private business before Congress. [Private bills are] judicial business, and legislative assemblies ought to have nothing to do with [them]" (quoted in U.S. Congress, House 1942, 49). And a House report in 1878 declared in disgust, "No tribunal can be less fitted to examine and decide upon private claims than the Congress" (U.S. Congress, House 1878, 1).

To alleviate the private bill problem, Congress experimented with the Court of Claims, which it established in 1855 (10 Stat. 612). This court represented a hybrid solution, midway between judicial and legislative determination of compensation for victims. Congress prohibited the Court from making legal determinations about liability, and the Court could only make recommendations to Congress about compensation for victims. This allowed members of Congress to "transfer responsibility [for private bills to the Court of Claims] but still make it possible for beneficial outcomes to be attributed to individual legislators" (Hill and Williams 1993, 1012). Although Congress expanded the Court's power in 1863, the Court was still too limited and weak to alleviate the glut of private bills. Abraham Lincoln (1862) took to berating Congress for the mess it had made in this area, saying, "It is as much the duty of Government to render prompt justice against itself in favor of citizens as it is to administer the same between private individuals." These words were eventually engraved on the Court of Claims building in Washington, D.C.

Nevertheless, the problem continued unabated until 1922, when Congress passed the Small Tort Claims Act. This act authorized the head of every federal department or establishment to "consider, ascertain, adjust and determine any claim" on account of damages to or loss of privately owned property, up to one thousand dollars, caused by the negligence of an officer or employee of the U.S. Government. This statute led to some strange and unjust results. For example, the government could be liable for the cost of a pocket watch crushed by a federal employee but not for the life of the person carrying it who was run down by a mail truck.

The explosion of federal employment during the Depression and World War II put tremendous pressure on Congress to enact an effective piece of legislation that would remove claims for governmental liability to the judiciary. After several stalled attempts in the 1930s and early 1940s, legislators in the Seventy-ninth Congress poised to pass a significant bill waiving sovereign immunity in tort. Then-Attorney General Robert Jackson recommended the FTCA for passage, saying, "The subject of tort claims against the government has long been a troublesome and vexatious matter.... The ... immunity of the Government to suit in . . . torts does not seem to be warranted either as a matter of principle or as a matter of justice" (U.S. Congress, House 1945, 7). It astonishes that in passing this legislation Congress held no hearings, as the bill promised to alter substantially the duties and functioning of members of Congress and affect countless thousands of constituents. It is true that Congress held hearings in 1942 on a similar bill that failed because of preoccupation with the war, but the FTCA represents a significant change in the arrangement of power and duties in the federal government, and it seems odd that it should proceed so quietly.

Originally, the FTCA set out to be a "general waiver" of sovereign immunity circumscribed by various exceptions. And occasionally, courts still refer to it in that way, though, at least when the DFE is implicated, it has long ceased to fulfill that function. The shift from the FTCA's original function as a general waiver of sovereign immunity to one good only in tightly circumscribed instances makes recovery under the FTCA difficult, to say the least.

The main waiver provision of the Act is short and clear: "The United States shall be liable...[for] tort claims, in the same manner and to the same extent as a private individual under like circumstances" (sec. 2674). Section 2680, though, lists 13 exceptions to this waiver of sovereign immunity. Some of the exceptions are quite sweeping, but the tiger of the lot is found in paragraph (a). The Discretionary Function Exception protects the government against claims "based upon the exercise or performance or the failure to exercise or perform a discretionary function or duty on the part of a federal agency or an employee of the Government, whether or not the discretion involved be abused." Though Robert Jackson (1940) later maligns the Supreme Court's broad interpretation of the provision in Dalehite, the terms of the DFE are in accord with his own stated New Deal impulse to free the administrator from judicial second-guessing. In the course of the last half-century, the DFE and other exceptions in the FTCA have eclipsed Congress's intention to make the United States broadly liable for negligent or malicious policies and decisions of administrators. The waiver to immunity has become the exception and the exceptions have become the rule; the FTCA has been turned inside out.

THE BIG BANG: FROM GENESIS TO EVOLUTION

The U.S. Supreme Court has visited the DFE on only four occasions, once in 1952 (Dalehite) and three times in the seven years spanning 1984–1991 (U.S. v. Varig Airlines 1984, Berkovitz v. U.S. 1988, and U.S. v. Gaubert 1991).

In Dalehite, after the destruction of Texas City, the United States and the thousands of plaintiffs who had filed suit agreed to litigate a "test" case in federal district court. All of the parties agreed to be bound by the results of the case, and the plaintiff won considerable damages at trial. Facing damages that could aggregate to more than $200 million (conservatively, $1.4 billion in year 2002 dollars), the stakes on appeal were enormous. In Dalehite it became clear that the FTCA could be much more than the means for compensating victims of governmentally caused injury and death and relieving Congress of the private bills burden; it could effect change in government just as expanded tort liability had changed corporate America. This was the potential result and regulative power for which Freund had hoped. The FTCA threatened to allow rank-and-file citizens to shape the activities and policies of government and to allow greater judicial oversight of the administrative process.

The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, hearing the appeal en banc, reversed the judgment, holding that the actions of the government in producing and shipping the FGAN were discretionary acts and therefore came under the ambit of the DFE. The court also noted that the DFE clearly indicated Congress's desire that administrators "be free from any unwarranted judicial supervision" (Texas City Disaster 1952, 778).

The U.S. Supreme Court heard the case in 1952 and, in a five-to-three decision, affirmed the ruling of the Fifth Circuit. The Court ruled that Congress did not intend to subject the sovereign to liability for "acts of a governmental nature or function" and that uppermost in Congress's waiver of sovereign immunity were "the ordinary common-law torts" (Dalehite, 28). The Court found it "unnecessary to define... where discretion ends," since the DFE "includes determinations made by executives or administrators in establishing plans, specifications or schedules of operations" (34).

But Justice Jackson, joined by Justices Black and Frankfurter, filed a scathing dissent. Jackson started by writing that the result of such a sweeping interpretation of the DFE meant that "the Government... can clothe official carelessness with a public interest. Hence, one of the unanticipated consequences of the Tort Claims Act has been to throw the weight of government influence on the side of lax standards of care" (50). And as for the Solicitor General's claim that the government should not be liable because it tried to emulate standard industry practice in shipping the FGAN, Jackson likened the argument to a request for "one free disaster" for each new policy (56).

Dalehite yields the paradoxical result that the greater the harm inflicted by administrators and their policies, the more remote the chance that they will be held accountable for their wrongdoing. As Jackson complained, the maxim that "The King can do no wrong" has "merely been amended to read, 'The King can do only little wrongs" (60). Lower courts interpreted Dalehite to set up a planning-operational test for application of the DFE. Planning activities were protected, while mere operational activities, those activities carrying out the details of policies and not invested with policy discretion, were not protected. For the next 30 years, the Court let its Dalehite ruling stand undisturbed, until it perceived that lower courts were taking liberties with the decision and using the planning-operational test to expand judicial oversight of administrative actions.

By the 1980s, the Court moved to quell the view that the interpretation of the DFE "expressed in Dalehite ha[d] been eroded, if not overruled" (U.S. v. Varig Airlines 1984 [hereafter Varig], 811). In Varig, relatives of passengers who died of smoke and toxic gas inhalation aboard a Boeing 707 sued the federal government for negligent inspection and certification of the aircraft. The district court found for the plaintiffs, and the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed. On appeal, the U.S. Supreme Court provided even broader governmental protection than that embraced by Dalehite.

The Court, in a unanimous opinion delivered by Chief Justice Burger, explained that application of the DFE depended upon two considerations: "First, it is the nature of the conduct, rather than the status of the actor, that governs whether the discretionary function exception applies in a given case"; "Second, [the DFE] plainly was intended to encompass the discretionary acts of the Government acting in its role as a regulator of the conduct of private individuals" (813). The exception is meant to prevent "judicial 'second guessing'" of policy decisions, but only those decisions "grounded in social, economic, and political policy" (814).

Four years later, another unanimous Court read the DFE to admit liability for administrators' negligent licensing and release of a lot of live polio vaccine. In Berkovitz v. U.S. (1988 [hereafter Berkovitz]), the plaintiff took live polio vaccine manufactured as Orimune and contracted polio. The disease permanently paralyzed Berkovitz, and he pressed two claims. First, he asserted that administrators negligently licensed the vaccine without first receiving testing information as required by law. Second, he claimed that they released a noncomplying lot of vaccine against their own regulations and practices. In defense, attorneys for the United States asserted that all regulatory actions are shielded from liability by the DFE. If the Court had accepted this argument, the consequences would have been enormous, since large expanses of governmental activity would have become immune to suit and judicial review. But the Court rejected this contention, holding that the DFE "will not apply when a federal statute, regulation, or policy specifically prescribes a course of action for an employee to follow" (536). Where there is no discretion there is no immunity. After Berkovitz, lower courts began to reinstitute the planning-operational distinction they had used up to the Varig decision, but the apparent loosening of judicial construction by the U.S. Supreme Court proved to be illusory.

In U.S. v. Gaubert (1991 [hereafter Gaubert]), a federal court of appeals applied a modified planningoperational distinction and found against the government. Administrators of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board (FHLBB) exerted heavy control over a bank, pressuring majority stockholder Thomas Gaubert to remove himself from management of the bank and to post a $25 million security interest guaranteeing the bank's solvency. The goal of the FHLBB was to force Gaubert's bank to merge with a weaker bank (Gaubert, 319). While Gaubert ran the bank, it was financially solvent, but after he stepped down, through a series of perplexing blunders, the FHLBB caused Gaubert's bank to fail (320). Gaubert lost his $25 million security and the value of the shares he held in the bank. The district court dismissed the case under the DFE, and the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed most of the lower court ruling. But the Court of Appeals also held that the DFE did not immunize the government for administrative actions made after assuming control of the day-to-day operational activities of the bank. The Supreme Court reversed, stating, "It is clear that the Court of Appeals erred in holding that the exception does not reach decisions made at the operational or management level of the bank involved in this case" (325). And in reclaiming territory for the government that it presumably lost in Berkovitz, the Court noted, "A discretionary act is one that involves choice or judgment; there is nothing in that description that refers exclusively to policymaking or planning functions.... Discretionary conduct is not confined to the policy or planning level" (325).

The Court reaffirmed the Varig analysis, holding that judges must determine the following: (1) Did the complained of action or inaction admit of discretion? and (2) If it did admit of discretion, was it the kind of discretion that Congress sought to immunize from liability? But the Court also added a requirement that creates a nearly insurmountable hurdle for plaintiffs: "For a complaint to survive a motion to dismiss, it must allege facts which would support a finding that the challenged actions are not the kind of conduct that can be said to be grounded in the policy of the regulatory regime" (324–5).

This meant that henceforth the burden would be on the plaintiff to show that the decision is one not "susceptible to policy analysis" (325). In explaining what "susceptible to policy analysis" meant, the Court reiterated its phrase from Varig. Decisions are protected if they implicate "social, economic, and political" policy (Gaubert, 323; Varig, 814). Very few decisions by bureaucrats cannot be squeezed into the frame of this ruling. Gaubert appears to be part of the Court's newfound respect for sovereign immunity in general and state sovereign immunity in particular. And Gaubert, along with cases such as Seminole Tribe of Florida v. Florida (1996) and Alden v. Maine (1999), signals that the doctrine of sovereign immunity is as vigorous today as it was at the beginning of the Republic. In Gaubert, again, there were no dissents, with only Justice Scalia filing a concurring opinion.

Gaubert reemphasized the formidable nature of the DFE and gave it a scope and strength beyond what it had in the past. And the Department of Justice wishes to husband this strength; using it only where the stakes are high so that it is not overused and therefore loses potency. For example, U.S. Attorneys are required to 'obtain approval from the appropriate Torts Branch Staff prior to raising the 'discretionary function exception' defense..." (Deptartment of Justice 2001, sec. 4-5.220). This is the only exception to the FTCA that requires prior approval before being used and, apparently, the only defense in any circumstances that must be cleared by the Department of Justice. It is clear that the DFE is the brightest flower in the "garland of prerogatives" that surrounds the sovereign in civil matters (Francis Bacon, quoted in Pollock and Maitland [1895] 1968, 517). But our citizens pay a steep price for the maintenance of this broad protection for governmental action.

QUANTITATIVE ANALYSIS OF DFE CASES

To understand the DFE better, this section examines 377 federal circuit courts of appeals cases where the DFE is invoked. These cases span the time period between the first appellate decision on the DFE, May 4, 1950, and March 7, 2001, and include all reported cases where courts ruled on assertion of the DFE or indicated in dicta how they would have ruled if they had reached that issue. Cases were selected using key word searches and other means on Lexis/Nexis and Westlaw and coded by the authors based on the nature of the issue, potential impacts, the characteristics of the plaintiff, and the successful use of the DFE. Based on these codes, assertion of the DFE succeeded 72% of the time with federal courts of appeals. Seventy-two percent of the appellate court decisions affirmed lower court rulings.

This descriptive overview of cases related to the DFE at the federal appeals courts level indicates considerable consistency. In other words, most cases are related to similar causes, the defense is successful most of the time, and lower court decisions are usually affirmed. However, this consistency reflects appeals decisions over 50 years and obscures patterns and variation over time.

Growth of the Use of the DFE

Since Dalehite, the numbers of cases brought to the federal courts of appeals have fluctuated. For the first 30 years, from 1950 to 1980, the average number of DFE cases is only two per year. The average during the period from 1980 to 2000 is 15 cases. Further, as indicated in Figure 1, there has been exponential growth in the number of cases heard, reaching a high of 27 cases in 1997. This growth tracks the increasing number of cases handled by the federal court system over the last 40 years. Civil appeals in federal appellate courts increased 10-fold between 1960 and 2000 and continue to grow (Federal Court Management Statistics 2000 Krafka, Cecil, and Lombard 1995, 3).

Success of the DFE Defense

It is logical to theorize that as the DFE's use grows, its efficacy should also increase. In addition, as discussed above, several landmark cases strengthened the DFE. For most of the period from 1950 through 1985, there are too few cases reported by the federal appeals courts to draw strong inferences. As a result, success rates range from 100 to 0%, and for several years in the 1970s, the success rate oscillates between 100 and about 50% (Figure 2). During the period from 1980 to 2000, the number of cases grows and a more accurate pattern emerges. From 1980 to 1990, the percentage successful invocations of the DFE ranges from 40% in 1982 to nearly 90% in 1985 and then decreases to 50% in 1989. After 1990, the percentage of successful use of the DFE grows rapidly, to nearly 90% in 1992, the year after Gaubert, and then consistently remains over 70%. The average success rate of the DFE is 85% from 1991 to 2000.

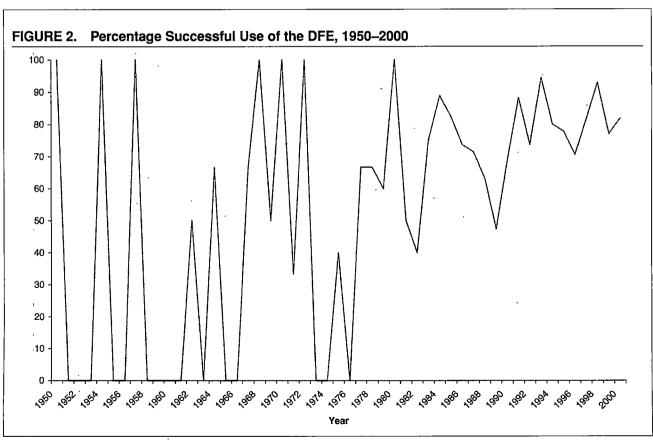

We examined three specific dimensions, based on a reading and coding of each of the 377 cases, to shed additional light on the DFE. Based on the coding protocol outlined below, we found that the intercoder reliability of these dimensions conducted by the authors was 100%. Issues that might have an impact on the likely successful use of the DFE include the following:

- (1) The number of actual and potential plaintiffs; a measure of the potential financial liability of the federal government. Determining the number of potential plaintiffs is straightforward in the large majority of cases: (a) We add up the number of named plaintiffs in a case; and (b) we determine the number of unnamed potential plaintiffs who could sue the government for the same underlying event giving rise to the case in question. In no instance did we encounter the problem of multiple cases arising from the same event, since federal civil and appellate procedure almost always requires such cases to be merged into a single action.
- (2) Whether a bureaucratic decision involving administrative discretion was minimal or substantial. This information came from the facts of the case and descriptions of the actions of government employees, and we asked (a) Did a federal employee directly participate in or undertake the actions that caused the injury? and (b) If not, was the injury so closely connected to substantial governmental regulation over the subject matter that it met the functional equivalent of direct participation?
- (3) Whether the broader policy implications are minimal, moderate, or substantial. First, we asked if, in the event of a finding of liability, a supervising administrator with control over the environment in question could reasonably make changes in policy to increase safety. This is a threshold question in that if the answer is "no," then ipso facto the effects on policy of a government loss are minimal. If the threshold is met, then we asked if the policy changes would be local, regional, or national in scope. In some cases policy changes would be confined to a particular locale and so would not have moderate or substantial affect on federal governmental policy. If policy changes would be national in scope, the case gained at least a "moderate" classification. If a loss in a case would cause the government to adopt new policies at the national level and would cause major expense or substantially redefine the duties of employees, we classified the case in the "substantial" category.

Number of Actual Potential Plaintiffs. The issue of the number of actual and potential plaintiffs examines whether the federal appeals courts are making considerations of the applicability of the DFE based on the potential scope of the financial impact of liability, rather than strictly on the merits of the case. In cases where the number of people affected is very large, then the successful use of the DFE should increase. When cases are coded based on the number of people affected, in 73% of the cases between one and 10 people are affected, in 8% of the cases between 11 and 100 people are affected, and in 17% of the cases over 100 people are affected. While these cutoffs are somewhat arbitrary, they suggest a low, middle, and substantial scope of impact.

There is no association between the number of people affected and the successful use of the DFE ( $\chi^2 = 1.02$ , p = 0.602). Overall, the DFE is used successfully 72% of the time. When fewer people are affected, the success rate is slightly lower than average (70% for the low and 72% for the middle categories). When the number of people affected is substantial (over 100) the DFE is successful 77% of the time, but again, this difference is not large enough to reach statistical significance. We note, though, that in class action suits against the U.S. Government under the FTCA, the DFE, when raised, is successful 100% of the time.

Involvement of the Bureaucracy. Because protection of the exercise of administrative discretion is the key principle of the DFE, when there is substantial bureaucratic involvement the DFE should be more likely to succeed. Conversely, when the role of the bureaucracy is minimal, the DFE should be less likely to succeed. In 54% of the cases the level of bureaucratic involvement is minimal, and 46% of the time the level of bureaucratic involvement is substantial. There is no statistical association between the level of bureaucratic involvement and the successful use of the DFE ( $\chi^2 = 0.293$ , p = 0.588). The DFE is successful in 73% of the cases where bureaucratic involvement is minimal and 70% of the cases where bureaucratic involvement is more substantial.

Policy Implications. When the policy implications of the case are substantial, the DFE should be more likely to succeed. In 36% of the cases, the policy implications are minimal, in 31% of the cases the policy implications are moderate, and in 33% of the cases the policy implications are substantial. There is a statistically significant association between policy implications and the successful use of the DFE ( $\chi^2 = 16.86$ , p = 0.000). In 65% of cases with minimal policy implications and 64% of cases with moderate policy implications the DFE is successful, compared to 85% of cases with substantial policy impact. This finding indicates that where a governmental loss in a case will work substantial changes on federal policy, the courts are substantially more likely to sustain the government's assertion of the DFE. This result stands in line with traditional New Deal principles of judicial deference to agency action. Where liability threatens "judicial sabotage" of agency independence, the judiciary is more likely to accept assertion of the DFE.

Predicting DFE Success. Logistic regression analysis is used to understand better the circumstances in which the DFE is mostly likely to be successful. The likelihood of success is examined as a function of the number of people potentially affected, the extent of involvement of the bureaucracy, and the policy consequences of the case.

When these three variables are included for all 377 cases, the model is statistically significant (model  $\chi^2 = 13.55$ ). As suggested by the bivariate analysis presented above, only the policy implications of the case are a statistically significant predictor of the likelihood that the DFE will be successful. The coefficient is for the number of people affected and is not in the expected direction. As the number of people affected increases. the likelihood that the government will allow itself to be sued increases (DFE not successful), however, this variable is not statistically significant. Bureaucratic involvement is in the expected direction but also is not statistically significant. Using the logistic regression to predict a "best case" for success, we find that for a case that involves many people and has substantial bureaucratic involvement and policy implications, the likelihood is that the DFE will be successful 80% of the time. The likelihood of success for the least favorable case, where many people are involved, there is little bureaucratic involvement, and there are no policy implications, is 60%.

As noted above, there is a clear difference during the pre- and the post-1980 periods in terms of the number of cases per year and the likelihood of success. Using the same model to examine cases since 1980, we find that the best-case scenario for DFE success is 79%, and in the worst case scenario the probability is 65%. These changes in the findings indicate that the application of the DFE is basically the same for the periods before and after the growth of the DFE began in 1980 (joint log likelihood test;  $\chi^2 = 6.71$ , not statistically significant). The DFE is slightly more successful under the worst-case scenario (from 0.60 to 0.65), which shows that the federal appeals courts have broadened the scope of the DFE to cases that affect fewer people and have low policy significance and bureaucratic involvement.

The same model was also run for the cases between 1990 and 2000. This period represents relative stability in the number of cases decided each year and increasingly consistent and high support of the DFE by federal appeals courts. The period from 1990 to 2000 is statistically different from the years prior to 1990 (joint log likelihood test;  $\chi^2 = 13.93$ , p < 0.05). This logistic regression is not statistically significant ( $\chi^2 = 2.23$ , p = 0.526) and none of the case characteristics are statistically significant predictors of the outcome of the case.

CONSEQUENCES OF THE DFE

There are three types of suspect consequences created by the DFE with which we are concerned: constitutional, informational, and policy consequences. Issues of accountability are distributed among these areas in the discussion below.

Constitutional Consequences

The statutory nature of the FTCA does not mean that it does not fulfill important functions in our constitutional framework. It has, after all, largely taken over the private bill function from Congress. Even before the statutory exception to the waiver of sovereign immunity found in the DFE, the courts had provided for something similar through the common law and construction of constitutional principles. Indeed, statutes exposing the government to liability that do not specifically contain a discretionary function exemption have been read to contain the provision implicitly. The DFE contained in the FTCA, as it has been fleshed out by the courts, is frequently imported into cases involving the Suits in Admiralty Act (1920), the Public Vessels Act (1925), and other statutes, even though those statutes do not contain a DFE clause. The DFE is not only an exception to a waiver of sovereign immunity, but also a firewall to preserve the doctrine of separation of powers in private actions against the government. The Supreme Court reaffirms time and again that the separation of powers is a "vital check against tyranny" and a "fundamental principle] of the Government established by the Framers of the Constitution" (Buckley v. Valeo 1976, 120-1). In the scales balanced by the Court, it is not just the arcane ancient doctrine of sovereign immunity on one side and injustice on the other. Added to the doctrine of sovereign immunity is concern for the functional integrity of our constitutional structure, and these two together, in the Court's eyes, generally outweigh the admitted injustice caused by the DFE.

But we think that the Court cuts a berth too wide of Congress and the President and ignores that the fundamental motivation behind the FTCA was to shift the burden for determining governmental liability from Congress to the judiciary. As discussed above, the main reason for this shift was to relieve Congress of the annoying and debilitating burden of private bills. But another, barely less substantial, motivation was to see that justice is done for those injured and killed by administrative negligence or malevolence. Congress itself reported that "the United States courts are well able and equipped to hear these claims and to decide them with justice" (U.S. Congress, Senate 1946, 25). Judicial deference in many DFE cases amounts, we think, to abdication by the courts of their constitutional responsibilities for oversight of Congress and the Executive and causes both unnecessary injustice and an unwise enlargement of Executive power.

Depriving the Public of Information

The DFE is a jurisdictional bar; when it operates, federal courts are without power to hear the case. So where the DFE is successful, it prevents not only trial but, much of the time, discovery. This means that there is no opportunity for the plaintiff to force production of evidence from the government. This makes the DFE a useful device to prevent the disclosure of embarrassing or politically explosive information. For example, in Consolidated Atmospheric Testing, in re (1987 [hereafter Consolidated]), the district court dismissed the case under the DFE before any discovery of government documents and witnesses could be accomplished. In this case, a large number of plaintiffs sued government contractors for illness and death due to their exposure to radiation through nuclear weapons manufacture and fallout from aboveground weapons tests. The fallout victims, "downwinders," as Howard Ball (1986, 197) concludes in an exhaustive study of the subject, were "misinformed about their safety, they were trapped in a bureaucratic operation that prevented the truth from emerging about the actual levels of radiation exposure." Congress, in what came to be known as the Warner Amendment, acted to cut off money damages remedies for these victims by making suit against the government under the FTCA the only available legal action for radiation exposure. This meant either that suits against contractors and other nongovernmental businesses and personnel were dismissed or that the government was substituted as the defendant.

Of course, Congress could not but anticipate that the government would prevail in these suits based on the doctrine of sovereign immunity and the DFE. In Consolidated, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the district court's dismissal of the suit under the DFE, and the U.S. Supreme Court denied certiorari (see, sub nomine, Konizeski v. Livermore Labs 1988). Congress's actions funneled victims into a headlong collision with the DFE, which offered little chance for recovery or even the opportunity to find the truth concerning the actions of administrators and contractors. It played out as expected, and when the Supreme Court denied certiorari it cut off legal recovery for over half a million victims and their families.<sup>3</sup>

But not only did the victims lose, but also the rest of the public. In some circumstances, discovery and trial are the most efficient means to unearth information about government practices. In this way, suit against the government complements regulatory goals of the First Amendment by providing important material showing what sorts of things the government is doing or has done in the past. Counsel who authored the unsuccessful Petition for Writ of Certiorari to the U.S. Supreme Court in Consolidated, later commented,

Had Congress permitted the suits to proceed, the plaintiffs would have been able through civil discovery to compel the production of a great deal of information about the manner in which the government and the contractors carried

Energy 1995, 24-30).

out the atomic tests, about the numbers and identities of exposed veterans, [and] about what the contractors and the government knew of the hazards of radiation at the time of the tests.... (Fletcher 1990, 308–9)

Although many in Congress were ambivalent about the disclosure of atomic testing information, a few members were decidedly against any disclosure. Senator Pete Domenici, for example, in arguing against a popular, though ultimately unsuccessful, effort to repeal the Warner Amendment, said that "lawyers... are kind of itching, just salivating [about suing the U.S. Government in radiation exposure cases]" and are acting not out of interest for their clients or even for money, "but to get their hands on the documents that are in the national laboratories so they can expose the American people what [sic] went on the past 50 years" (Congressional Record 1990, S12119).

It is difficult to see what damage disclosure of documents in this area would have had except for embarrassment. Most of these documents have now been released, and many thousands are available on the Web through government servers. These disclosures. though controversial, had salutary effects on our society and government. Senator Domenici and those who worked to defeat the repeal of the Warner Amendment were nearsighted. Embarrassment at disclosure is also a means of accountability, a way of controlling administrative behavior, and courts flatly reject potential embarrassment as a basis for prior restraint or criminal prosecution in the disclosure of government documents. As Justice Douglas noted, "The dominant purpose of the First Amendment was to prohibit the widespread practice of governmental suppression of embarrassing information" (New York Times Co. v. U.S. 1971, 723-4).

Unless an injured party, especially after Gaubert, already has facts in hand to show that a policy violation occurred or that the decision was not discretionary, he or she will frequently not have the opportunity to force government production of evidence pertinent to the case.

Policy and Directive Formulation

Government attorneys and policymakers know that liability will arise when an agent of the government violates a specific and clear directive. As discussed in Berkovitz, the government's negligent release of a vaccine lot that failed to conform to specified standards drew liability. This standard for recovery in some circumstances gives no incentive for administrators and policymakers to develop policies and directives aimed at protecting the public. Administrators can simply opt to write no standards or specific directives in those situations where that is possible. As a circuit court of appeals in a recent case found, "The random and uncodified practices of a local supervisor cannot create the kind of specific obligation that gives rise to liability" (Irving v. U.S. 1998, 168). This finding, and others like it, encourages administrators to adopt vague policies.

The public policy goals of tort law are predicated on a number of effects that liability has on actors. Among these is the aim of increased safety by visiting liability on people best positioned to cause changes in policy and practice. But the DFE preempts these effects, and poor policies, or policies that cause avoidable dangers, go unexposed and unchanged; "[a] predicament...at odds with the FTCA's promise to treat the government like a 'private person' for purposes of tort liability" (Levine 2000, 1542). We do not rule out the possibility that agencies will change their behavior because of attempted yet unsuccessful litigation. But the high success rate of the DFE and the extremely small chance that any suit will be successful provide little impetus for administrators to revisit policies after unsuccessful suits.

Additionally, administrators engage in two practices that further immunize agencies and personnel from accountability. The first of these is founded upon statutes that allow for the United States to substitute itself for named defendants in certain circumstances. The Westfall Act (1988, sec. 2679(d)(1)) allows the government to substitute itself as defendant for a federal worker when the Attorney General certifies that the worker was acting within the scope of his or her employment when the injury occurred. Once the government is substituted as defendant, the problem is shifted from the employee and agency in question to the Department of Justice. The offending employee and his or her agency are not made to internalize the costs of their actions.

The second practice that insulates administrators from accountability is found in the way the United States pays out judgments when it does lose to a plaintiff. Even if a plaintiff is successful in suit against the government or negotiates a settlement, judgments larger than specified dollar amounts for each agency are paid out of a judgment fund maintained by the Department of the Treasury's Financial Management Service (FMS) (1998, 1999). For example, judgments in excess of $25 thousand against the FBI are referred to the FMS for payment. Further, any judgments paid from the fund do not come out of the offending agency's budget. Thus there is no incentive for administrators to reevaluate policies and procedures in the wake of liability, since they do not have to provide the legal resources to defend their agencies or pay judgments. Former Attorney General Reno (1997) remarked, "I came to Washington to discover that a client agency oftentimes has a judgment paid out of a judgment fund rather than its regular appropriation. It doesn't hurt. So there's not that much of an incentive. Let the Justice Department worry about it."

The Department of Justice Torts Division has become adept at handling problems not its own, injuries it did not inflict. It draws accountability away from offending agencies and flawed or even malicious policies, thus alleviating the need to evaluate those policies in light of the injuries they cause to citizens. Increased success of the DFE, coupled with the Westfall Act and the operation of the judgment fund, leads to precisely the sort of unchecked discretion that thinkers reacting to New Deal administrative theory feared most.

CONCLUSION

There are often good reasons and uses for the retention of sovereign immunity, even when administrators act negligently or intentionally in harming citizens. But this retention of immunity should be carefully circumscribed so that the beneficial functions of making the government vulnerable to suit are not undermined. Administrators, though, most vigorously assert immunity where the damage imposed on society is greatest. This means that often neither the oversight function of administrative action transferred by Congress to the judiciary in the FTCA nor the ameliorative effects of liability will reach government administrators. By admission of the Chief of the Torts Branch, Department of Justice (Axelrad 2001), when government caused injuries are far reaching, as in the class action suits of Consolidated Atmospheric Testing, in re (1987) and Agent Orange, in re (1987), the DFE is the primary means for preventing liability or discovery. Indeed, the United States won in all eight reported federal courts of appeals cases in which it raised the DFE to protect itself against class actions.

With such a successful tool available, the temptation to use it is understandably strong, and this substantially affects our constitutional system and governmental accountability. In giving too much deference to the separation of powers and the doctrine of sovereign immunity, the federal judiciary created an environment that sometimes does not encourage administrators to use care or to abandon unnecessarily injurious policies. The DFE is an anachronism, a living remnant of New Deal faith in the expert agency that must be free of judicial sabotage. Although the effectiveness and advisability of comprehensive judicial oversight of administrative agencies are a contentious issue, in the case of the FTCA and the DFE many of the standard reasons for deferring to administrative discretion are less convincing than in other circumstances. In the context of the DFE, judges do not order agencies to forgo or modify policies, nor do they substitute their judgment for that of the administrator. Considering the operation of the judgment fund, one cannot even say that imposition of liability is the functional equivalent of replacement of agency expertise by judge-made predilection. No doubt liability does prompt policy changes, but it is unpersuasive to claim that administrators who do not feel the sting of monetary damages under the FTCA are nevertheless under judicial coercion to change or modify policies causing injury.

Reinterpreting the DFE narrowly and expanding judicial power to influence agency policies and practices could expose agencies to greater public scrutiny. Information made public through legal action may also provide impetus and guidance for congressional efforts at agency oversight. As Raoul Berger testified, Congress cannot perform its duty to investigate agencies "from hell to breakfast" (U.S. Congress, House 1972, 3132) without information "as to what is going on in the subterranean depths of the executive branch" (3116). Sometimes one of the best ways of plumbing those "subterranean depths" is by means of a suit in tort.

Above all, we cannot forget the interests of the deserving plaintiffs who nonetheless are cut off from justice by operation of the DFE. Lawrence Friedman (1985, 43), in his book Total Justice, claims that "general expectations" of recompense and justice have become "superprinciples" in our society. It would be difficult, though, to find a more severe violation of "total justice" than the DFE, and it thwarts Friedman's "superprinciples" with astonishing frequency.

Bringing the State Back In to Civic Engagement: Policy Feedback Effects of the G.I. Bill for World War II Veterans

merican civic engagement soared in the mid-twentieth century, succeeding an era in which national government had become more involved in citizens' lives than ever before. I examine the effects of the G.I. Bill's educational provisions for veterans' subsequent memberships in civic organizations and political activity. I consider theoretical arguments about how public social programs might affect civic involvement and advance a policy feedback approach that assesses both resource and interpretive effects of policy design. Newly collected survey and interview data permit the examination of several hypotheses. The analysis reveals that the G.I. Bill produced increased levels of participation—by more fully incorporating citizens, especially those from less privileged backgrounds, through enhancement of their civic capacity and predisposition for involvement. The theoretical framework offered here can be used to evaluate how other public programs affect citizens' participation in public life.

merican civic engagement peaked in the midtwentieth century, as memberships in civic organizations soared and political participation reached record levels (Putnam 2000, chap. 1). This "golden age" succeeded a period in which national government had become more involved than ever before in providing rights of economic security and wellbeing to American citizens. Was the sequencing of government-sponsored social opportunity and heightened levels of civic activity merely a coincidence? If not, how did government programs encourage beneficiaries to become more active citizens? Current research cannot tell us, because analysts of civic and political participation focus primarily on individual demographic factors or social conditions. When government programs are discussed, the focus is generally on means-tested welfare programs, which are associated with lower levels of participation among recipients (Mead 1986; Piven and Cloward 1971). We know little about how major social programs that reach broad sectors of the population have shaped civic participation.

This article examines the effects of the G.I. Bill of Rights, one of the most generous and inclusive social

I am thankful to Wayne Grove, Jeff Stonecash, and, Eric Welch for numerous invaluable conversations at every stage of the process and to Andrew Milstein, Lori Beth Way, and McGee Young for extensive research assistance. Several scholars provided useful comments on early drafts of this paper, including Vernon Greene, Jerome Legge, Robert Lieberman, Paul Peterson, Sally Selden, Elaine Sharp, Doug Wolf, four anonymous reviewers, and participants in the Center for American Political Studies seminar at Harvard University, the American Political Development and Political Institutions seminar at the University of Michigan, and the Political Psychology, Public Administration, and American Politics seminars at Syracuse University.

entitlements the federal government has ever funded and administered, on veterans' participation in civic organizations and political activities during the postwar era. Formally known as the "Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944," the program extended numerous social benefits, including higher education and vocational training, to returning veterans of World War II (Olson 1974; Ross 1969). Fifty-one percent of all returning veterans-7.8 million-took advantage of the educational benefits. By 1947, veterans on the G.I. Bill accounted for 49% of students enrolled in American colleges. Within 10 years after World War II, 2,200,000 veterans had attended college and 5,600,000 had participated in vocational training programs or on-the-job training under the G.I. Bill (U.S. Presidents' Commission on Veterans' Pensions 1956a, 287).

Perhaps one of the most important effects of a public program is whether it promotes or discourages citizen involvement in the day-to-day activities of American democracy. Does a vast commitment of public resources yield only social and economic effects, such as increased education, with no effect on democratic governance itself? Alternatively, might program benefits render recipients less inclined to participate in public life, if being treated as rights-bearing citizens makes them lose sight of their civic obligations? Or could program participation have a positive effect, either by endowing beneficiaries with a sense that they owe something back to society or by more fully incorporating them as full members of the democratic community?

Arguably, the policymaking process should be informed by consideration of questions such as these, which address the effects of policy design for civic engagement. Despite contemporary concern over the decline of social capital and participation, we have not developed a systematic way of investigating the role that government plays in shaping citizens' involvement. Such relationships are complex and must be understood in historical context. This article focuses on the effects of one landmark program for civic engagement and offers a theoretical framework though which other public programs might also be evaluated.

POLICIES AS INSTITUTIONS: POLICY DESIGN AND FEEDBACK

The role of government programs has received relatively little attention from scholars who study determinants of civic and political participation. Most focus primarily on social and demographic characteristics such as age, sex, income, and free time, evaluating their importance as predictors of participation (e.g., Putnam 2000, chaps. 10–13; Verba, Schlozman, and Brady 1995, chaps. 10–12). To the extent that institutions are studied, the focus is usually on nonpolitical institutions such as churches, civic associations, and the workplace (e.g., Baumgartner and Walker 1988; Peterson 1992).

When the participatory effects of government programs are investigated, scholars suggest that they do matter: Beneficiaries exhibit higher subsequent levels of involvement with regard to related issues. Noting that farmers vote at significantly higher levels than other citizens, Wolfinger and Rosenstone (1980, 32) propose that government agricultural programs elevate "their sense of the personal relevance of politics." Verba, Schlozman, and Brady (1995, chaps. 7, 14) find that the magnitude of participatory effects varies by program: Beneficiaries of non-means-tested programs such as Social Security and Medicare are more likely to get involved in related issues than beneficiaries of means-tested programs. Rosenstone and Hansen (1993, 101-17) reason that participation by program beneficiaries is higher, as in the case of Social Security recipients, because politicians and groups target those individuals for strategic mobilization. These analyses serve as correctives to the society-centric focus of most studies of participation. While their focus is limited to citizens' instrumentalist efforts to influence the issue area that affects them directly, collectively they point to the broader question of how government programs might shape citizens' orientation toward and participation in public life generally.

Among students of public policy, this question was raised long ago, first by E. E. Schattschneider (1935) and later by Theodore Lowi (1964). Both suggested that policies function as institutions, imposing particular norms and rules on recipients, and thus, in turn, reshaping politics itself. Furthering these ideas, scholars have noted that policies convey to citizens their rights and privileges as well as their duties and obligations as members of the community (Landy 1993; Mead 1986, 7). Through features of their design, policies may shape beneficiaries' subjective experience of what it means to be a citizen, giving them a sense of their role, place, and value within the polity; they may affect the formation of political identity among individuals and groups; and they may unify or stratify society and the political community in new and different ways (Schneider and Ingram 1993, 1997, 78–89, 140–45).

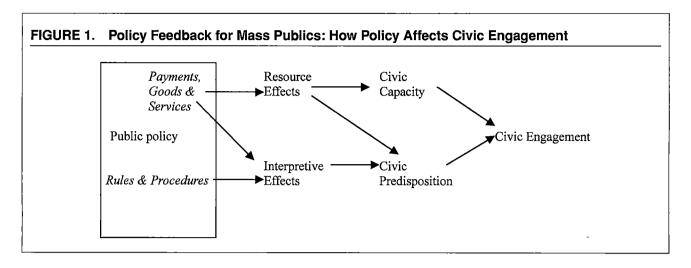

Two recent studies begin to test these claims empirically, offering insights into why government programs vary in their effects on political action. Joe Soss (1999) found that program clients perceived the agency with which they interacted as a microcosm of government itself and extrapolated from their experiences lessons about their own role in the political system. Given distinct rules and procedures marking program administration, social insurance beneficiaries gained a greater sense of external political efficacy, while public assistance recipients took away negative messages. Andrea Campbell (2000) demonstrates that Social Security has especially salutary effects on program-related participation among beneficiaries from low to moderate income backgrounds, as greater dependence on program resources makes them more inclined to be involved.

Continuing this line of inquiry, I propose a theoretical model of the dynamics through which policies affect civic and political participation, highlighting aspects of policy design that might produce such effects. I build on the policy feedback approach, which views public policy as an independent variable with consequences for politics (Pierson 1993; Skocpol 1992, 57-60). Paul Pierson (1993) has noted that policy feedback analysis to date has focused primarily on effects on organized interests or political elites and has called for more attention to effects on "mass publics," meaning citizens generally. He proposed analysis of two dynamics: (1) resource effects—how the resources and incentives that policies provide shape patterns of behavior; and (2) interpretive effects—how policies convey meanings and information to citizens. To make Pierson's approach more applicable to the effects of policy on civic engagement, I draw on Verba, Schlozman, and Brady's (1995, 270–2) Civic Voluntarism Model, with its attention to the impact of resources (free time, money, and civic skills) and psychological predisposition (attributes such as political efficacy, a sense of civic duty, and a group consciousness of having one's fate linked to others'). In addition, attention to the tools and rules of policy design, as highlighted by Schneider and Ingram (1997, 93–9), permits analysis of interpretive effects of public policy.

The resulting theoretical framework, illustrated in Figure 1, extends policy feedback theory to specify how policy affects civic engagement. First, the resources bestowed on citizens through policy, whether in the form of payments, goods, or services, have distinct resource effects on individuals' material well-being and life opportunities and, thus, directly affect their capacity (meaning ability, aptitude, or faculty) for participation. Second, features of policy design, including the administrative rules and procedures highlighted by Soss and the form and scope of eligibility and coverage, have interpretive effects on citizens. Through such features, individual citizens acquire perceptions of their role in the community, their status in relation to other citizens and government, and the extent to which a policy has affected their lives. As a result, policy design shapes citizens' psychological predisposition to participate in public life. In addition, the resources offered through a policy have interpretive effects inasmuch as citizens perceive those aspects of government programs to affect their life circumstances. Finally, resource effects influence civic predisposition: Education, for example, promotes attitudes of civic duty (Wolfinger and Rosenstone 1980, 36). This study uses this theoretical framework to examine the effects of one broad-based, universal social program for civic engagement; potentially, a wide range of public policies can be investigated similarly.

HYPOTHESIZING THE EFFECTS OF THE G.I. BILL ON CIVIC LIFE

Considering how the educational provisions of the G.I. Bill might affect civic and political participation, existing theoretical approaches would lead scholars to make a variety of predictions. The most common of these, based on society-centered and behavioral explanations, assign little causal significance to public programs. The first, the preexisting characteristics variant, would suggest that any differences in the participation levels of program users and nonusers must emanate from endogenous factors, differences in the prior personal attributes and experiences of those from each group. Proponents might point to the veteran status of program users, noting that those in birth cohorts that were of draft age at the time of major wars have higher subsequent participation levels than other citizens (Bennett 1986, 104-5). Others might stress membership in the "civic generation," Americans born between 1910 and 1940, whose engagement may have been prompted by the shared experience of World War II (Putnam 2000, chap. 14). Still others would suggest that veterans who took advantage of the G.I. Bill's educational provisions were likely to have come from more privileged socioeconomic backgrounds than nonusers (Story 1998), already endowed with factors that facilitate subsequent participation. The preexisting characteristics approach implies that as long as the analysis controls for the appropriate variables, the G.I. Bill will be revealed to be insignificant in explaining participation.

A second type of behavioral analysis, the by-product explanation, recognizes that the goods or services extended through public programs have effects on participation but considers policy design to be irrelevant to such outcomes. This explanation is salient in the case of policies that extend resources, such as education, which are considered to be determinants of civic activity. The fact is well established that higher educational levels are positively related to higher participation levels (e.g., Jennings and Niemi 1981, chap. 8; Wolfinger and Rosenstone 1980, 17-24). The institutions of formal education are known to produce a more tolerant and informed citizenry (e.g., Nie, Junn, and Stehlik-Barry 1996; PS 2000). Therefore, the by-product approach would predict increased participation inasmuch as the G.I. Bill allowed people to extend their education. The mechanism through which such education was provided, however, would not be considered determinative of the outcomes. The public program would be understood only as an incidental vehicle for the true source of increased participation, education itself.

Other theoretical approaches assume that policies themselves have causal effects on participation. The passivity explanation implies that social programs are responsible for undermining active citizenship. Adherents assert that the expansion of social rights has weakened civil society and fostered dependency among citizens, advancing a rights-claiming orientation that has displaced attention to civic obligations (e.g., Fukuyama 1995, 313-4; Glendon 1991). In fact, these criticisms are generally leveled at means-tested public assistance programs, not universal programs. Yet, because this literature does not specify differential effects of policy design, it is included in this analysis to test its explanatory value more broadly. Applied to the G.I. Bill, the passivity approach implies that beneficiaries would exhibit lower levels of involvement in public life than those who did not rely on government benefits to fund their education.

Despite their differences, these first three explanations share the common trait of downplaying the significance that public programs may have in citizens' lives and overlooking the intricacies of the relationship between program design and civic outcomes. The behavioral approaches perceive public policy to be epiphenomenal, while the passivity approach treats government programs in an overly generalized fashion. A policy feedback approach, in contrast, offers attention to both resource and interpretive effects of policy design and, thus, provides analytical tools for explaining how program features affect participation.

The G.I. Bill was designed as a broad-based, universal program, with generous educational benefits that were widely accessible to returning veterans (Skocpol 1996). To be eligible, veterans needed only to have an honorable discharge and to have served at least 90 days of active duty (Brown 1946, 13). The policy granted one year of education or training to all veterans who had served for 90 days, with an additional month of education for each additional month of service up to a maximum of 48 months. All tuition and fees were covered up to a total of $500 per year, and veterans received monthly subsistence payments of $75 if they were single, $105 if they had one dependent, and $120 if they had two or more dependents (U.S. Congress 1973, 20).<sup>2</sup>

Drawing on the policy feedback approach, I propose that these features of policy design had resource and incentive effects that promoted increased participation. Given that G.I. Bill educational benefits were generous, and because education has far-reaching consequences for individuals in terms of occupational status, income, and social networks, the resource effects of the policy were likely to have had a pronounced effect on individuals' capacity to be involved in civic and political life. In addition, to the extent that individuals perceived the G.I. Bill benefits to make a meaningful difference in their well-being and life opportunities, the program may have had interpretive effects that promoted individuals' psychological predisposition for civic participation. These resource and interpretive effects could operate through two dynamics: reciprocity and critical effects.

According to the reciprocity explanation, the G.I. Bill's resource effects would have fostered among recipients a sense of obligation, of owing something back to society. In the post-World War II era, the G.I. Bill was not considered a quid pro quo for military service; rather, it was enacted fairly late in the war as a way to convey appreciation to veterans and to prevent massive unemployment by channeling some veterans toward school instead of the workplace (Olson 1974, chap. 1; Ross 1969, chaps. 3, 4). The law's provisions were munificent and broad in scope compared to the meager benefits offered to World War I veterans, which were geared toward disabled veterans (Kato 1995, 2038–9). Receiving such unexpected and valuable resources may well have promoted a sense of reciprocity among veterans.

The critical effects explanation suggests that the G.I. Bill's extension of social rights may have had, through both resource and interpretive effects, a pronounced impact on individuals from less advantaged groups that, in turn, affected their participation dramatically. Scholars have noted that while socioeconomic background plays an important role in influencing the likelihood of political participation, subsequent factors such as participation in religious and social organizations or the workplace may ameliorate such effects and elevate the participation levels of those who began life without generous civic endowments (e.g., Strate et al. 1989; Verba, Schlozman, and Brady 1995, chap. 13). Comparable results could be expected from the G.I. Bill if the policy incorporated less advantaged citizens more fully into the polity.

How might such dynamics operate? First, the G.I. Bill's resources may have been most consequential for civic capacity among those who could not have afforded advanced education otherwise. This hypothesis draws on the work of Wolfinger and Rosenstone (1980, 25), which found that while increases in education generally raise the likelihood of voter participation, college education has an especially pronounced effect in promoting participation among those from poorer backgrounds and matters somewhat less for those from higher-income backgrounds. Second, features of program design may have had interpretive effects that enhanced less privileged veterans' predisposition to participate most dramatically. The G.I. Bill functioned as a universal policy, open to any veteran who wished to take advantage of it, regardless of income or class background. The program operated through impersonal, routinized rules and procedures rather than the invasive scrutiny and means testing associated with public assistance programs. Scholars have suggested that such policies may bestow dignity upon individuals, whereas targeted or means-tested policies tend to stigmatize them instead (Skocpol 1991, 414).

THE DATA AND RESEARCH DESIGN

Most studies of participation are based on large data sets that include numerous variables regarding demographic characteristics and attitudes but little about government programs. Such data are generally inadequate for examining in depth the kinds of hypotheses discussed above, and they are useless for studying the G.I. Bill's effects because they lack indicators about program participation. Conversely, although a few surveys of veterans conducted shortly after World War II permit analysis of the characteristics of G.I. Bill beneficiaries and the socioeconomic effects of the program, they failed to ask about participation in civic and political life (e.g., Frederiksen and Schrader 1951; U.S. General Accounting Office 1951). Therefore,

I used a survey and in-depth, open-ended interviews to collect both quantitative data and qualitative data. A national, random sample of all World War II veterans was not available, so it was necessary to find an alternative means of reaching veterans. Many survivors from World War II military units have formed their own veterans' organizations, groups that typically have mailing lists, generate newsletters, and hold reunions. I contacted several such organizations in an attempt to locate a few that were sufficiently different from each other and large enough to include veterans with a wide range of personal backgrounds, military ranks, and wartime experiences. For the study, I used lists from four military units, two from the U.S. Army (87th Infantry Division, 89th Division) and two from the U.S. Army Air Force (379th Bomb Group; 783rd Bomb Squadron, 465th Bomb Group).<sup>3</sup> These units included only men; also, because the World War II military was still segregated, African Americans served in separate units, none of which were included in this version of the survey.<sup>4</sup>

The quantitative component of the research design consisted of a mail survey of 1,000 veterans. The survey investigated topics such as family background, civic and political activities, military service, education and training, the G.I. Bill, occupational history, and demographics. Most of the questions had been used in prior surveys but never combined in a single survey in a manner that would permit systematic analysis.5 The data permit investigation of the G.I. Bill's consequences for memberships in civic organizations and participation in political activities, while controlling for level of education and various socioeconomic background factors. The survey subjects were randomly selected from 4,000 names on the World War II military unit organizations' lists. In August 1998, each subject received a cover letter, a 12-page survey booklet, and a reply envelope, followed by a reminder postcard one week later. Two subsequent packets were sent to nonrespondents four weeks and eight weeks later, to limit bias from early respondents. The survey yielded 716 completed surveys, a 73.5% response rate.

I considered the possible sources of bias in a sample based on military unit associations. Regional biases were not a concern because World War II units were drawn from the nation as a whole, and veterans who belong to their associations live throughout the nation. Possibly, this research design might target veterans who were predisposed to active participation in civic life if membership in a veterans' organization implied such bias. Interviews revealed, however, that these groups do not demand active participation and

An obstacle to attaining mailing lists is that some veterans' organizations have bylaws that prohibit list circulation; efforts to attain lists from Navy and Marine units were thwarted by such restrictions.
 Among the respondents, 98.5% described themselves as white.

that not all members initiated their own membership status. Rather, the groups have made a great effort to include as many survivors as possible on their lists, while the percentage who actually attend reunions and participate actively is small. Survey questions about participation in each veterans' organization confirmed the wide disparity in degrees of involvement.

The fact that several decades have elapsed since the G.I. Bill was administered necessitated careful attention to constraints upon subjects' memory and recall. Before designing the survey, I conducted several open-ended interviews with veterans. This process, followed by a pretest of the survey instrument and focus group with participants, allowed me to improve question wording and to limit questions to those that veterans typically answer readily and with confidence. Participation in the war and the pursuit of education thereafter constitute landmark events in the autobiographical knowledge of most veterans and, as such, are memorable (Tourangeau, Rips, and Rasinski 2000, 67–83). I used techniques that are known to improve the accuracy of responses: a survey instrument that gave respondents ample time to answer questions and questions organized in a framework that facilitated both forward (chronological) and backward recall (Tourangeau, Rips, and Rasinski 2000, 94–5, 146). These measures are discussed further in Appendix A.

The timing of the survey made it imperative to pay close attention to the representativeness of the sample. Conceivably, differential death rates among subgroups in the population mean that a sample drawn in 1998 is likely to differ systematically from one drawn in the immediate postwar era. Users and nonusers of G.I. Bill educational benefits provide the primary basis of comparison for this article. Among survey respondents, veterans who used the program constituted 60.8% of the total, 10% higher than among the original population. It is important to note that considerable variation exists among both G.I. Bill users and nonusers in terms of level of education completed prior to military service: Respondents from each of nine educational levels were present in each group. Such variation makes it possible to control for important background variables. Vocational training participants are underrepresented, meaning that it will be necessary to consider the consequences of each type of program usage separately. The representativeness of the sample is considered more thoroughly in Appendix B.

The qualitative component of the research consisted of 28 semistructured, open-ended interviews with veterans in all regions of the United States. Their names were drawn from the same lists as used for the survey. The interviews covered the same basic topics as the survey but offer the opportunity to probe responses in greater depth and to understand their meaning in the context of individual lives (Hochschild 1981). They allow exploration of veterans' perceptions regarding the role of military service and education in their lives, civic and political participation in the period 1950–64 as distinguished from the present, why they did or did not use the G.I. Bill, and their attitudes toward the program. Each interview lasted between one and a half and three hours. Analysis of the survey data and interview data is an interactive process: I alternately investigate the survey data regarding questions or patterns suggested by the interviews and return to the interview data for a contextual understanding of how aggregate trends are manifested in the lives of individuals.

&lt;sup>6</sup> To conduct these interviews, I traveled to all regions of the United States. Before each trip. I sent letters, requesting interviews, to about 30 individuals living within a two-hour radius of my base location. Among those who agreed to be interviewed, I selected five to seven individuals who lived in a variety of neighborhoods and areas.

The analysis here is limited to the immediate postwar period, 1950–64. This era partially overlapped with and succeeded the time during which veterans had access to the G.I. Bill's educational benefits. Thus, effects of inclusion in the program might be traced most clearly during this period. Also, because the era is considered the high-water mark for organizational memberships in the United States (Putnam 2000, 54), I limit the analysis to assess whether the G.I. Bill contributed to such outcomes.

I have operationalized the dependent variable, civic engagement, in two ways: civic group memberships and political participation. The first of these combines the sum of each individuals' memberships in four types of civic organizations from 1950 to 1964. The rate of memberships in organizations is regarded as a chief indicator of civic engagement (Putnam 2000; Skocpol, Ganz, and Munson 2000). The survey asked respondents to indicate whether they have ever been a member of each of several organizational types and then, if they have, to note the number of such organizations to which they belonged during each of three time periods. The civic memberships variable combines memberships in fraternal groups (e.g., Lions, Elks), neighborhood or homeowners' associations, Parent-Teacher Association (PTA) or school support groups, and a category entitled "any other civic or community organization."

Second, to assess determinants of political participation, I have operationalized the dependent variable as a composite of participation in a range of political activities between 1950 and 1964. One indicator, memberships in political organizations during the period 1950-64, includes the number of memberships in political clubs or political party committees. Five other indicators of participation during the same time period are also included, namely, contacting a political official to communicate concerns about some problem or issue; working on a campaign for a candidate running for national, state, or local office; serving on any official local government board or council that deals with community problems or issues; contributing money to an individual candidate, party, or other organization that supported candidates; and participating in a protest, march, or demonstration. Each of these is coded 1 if the respondent ever participated during 1950–64 and 0 if never.

The analyses include several explanatory variables that are widely considered to be important determinants of participation. Scholars know that individuals' participation in early adulthood is highly influenced by factors such as socioeconomic well-being in childhood, parents' level of participation, and educational level (Verba, Schlozman, and Brady 1995, chap. 15). As measures, I include level of education (measured on a scale from 1 to 9, from elementary school to advanced graduate work), parents' level of education (coded on a seven-point scale, from no formal schooling to graduate or professional degree),8 standard of living during their childhood in the 1920s (ranked on a scale from 1 to 5), and parents' civic activity and political activity (each ranked from 1 to 5, from not active to very active). Standard of living during the 1960s (ranked from 1 to 5) offers a measure of socioeconomic well-being during the period under investigation. The G.I. Bill variable pertains to nonuse or use of the program's educational benefits (coded 0 or 1, respectively). Because all those in the sample are veterans and members of the same generation, it was unnecessary to control for those variables.

RESULTS

Did the educational provisions of the G.I. Bill affect participation in public life and, if so, how? To assess this relationship, first I consider a model for predicting the rate at which veterans joined civic organizations in the postwar era. The model contains G.I. Bill use and standard explanatory variables and control variables for participation.

The most striking result of the ordinary least-squares regression (OLS), presented in Table 1, is that use of the G.I. Bill's educational provisions was highly significant in determining the degree to which veterans joined civic organizations in 1950–64. <sup>10</sup> G.I. Bill use had a positive

effect: Individuals who benefited from the provisions were members of significantly greater numbers of civic organizations than nonusers. Not surprisingly, given the well-known connection between socialization in child-hood and subsequent participation, veterans whose parents were active in civic activity were significantly more likely to be members of organizations (Jennings and Niemi 1981, chap. 4; Verba, Schlozman, and Brady 1995, 418–20, 437–8). Level of education and standard of living during the 1960s also proved to be positive determinants of joining organizations, the latter at a lower level of significance. Neither of the two childhood socioeconomic indicators appears to bear a significant relationship to civic organization memberships. 12

While these results verify the importance of the demographic and social factors emphasized by the preexisting characteristics approach, they also reveal that a model that overlooked the role of the G.I. Bill would be deficient in explaining the likelihood of veterans to join civic organizations. Certainly, preexisting characteristics themselves matter. Most notably, veterans raised by parents active in civic activities became socialized to participate at high levels themselves once they reached early adulthood. Similarly, those who enjoyed higher standards of living participated at higher levels, a finding consistent with research that illustrates how the abundant civic resources, skills, and networks associated with high socioeconomic status lead to greater participation. Yet the most novel finding here is that the G.I. Bill's impact is not reducible to socioeconomic background. Nor can the effect of the G.I. Bill on civic participation be discarded as a proxy for veteran status or belonging to the generation that came of age with World War II. <sup>13</sup> The preexisting characteristics hypothesis, therefore, is incomplete.

The by-product explanation, similarly, proves to be insufficient for explaining veterans' civic participation. Certainly the G.I. Bill facilitated increases in individuals' educational attainment, which is likely to have prompted higher rates of joining organizations. Perhaps the most fascinating finding here, though, is that the G.I. Bill benefits were not merely a conduit for higher levels of education. The policy also had an independent effect on civic membership rates. The form of public provision through which G.I. Bill beneficiaries obtained their education appears to have stimulated civic involvement.

The passivity explanation must be discounted, given that it predicted a negative effect of the G.I. Bill on civic participation. Contrary to expectations, this government program promoted civic involvement. This finding suggests that attention to the features of policy design and the dynamics they engender is necessary for explaining how the G.I. Bill and other government programs might vary in terms of their consequences for participation.

The prediction offered by the policy feedback explanation, that the G.I. Bill would yield significant, positive effects, was the single theoretical argument that proved correct in the case of civic memberships. Next, we examine the effect of the G.I. Bill on memberships in political organizations and activities in the same period, 1950–64. Here the model is similar to the civic version used previously, with the substitution of parents' political activity for parents' civic activity. The OLS regression results are shown in Table 2. Notably, once again, use of the G.I. Bill for education proved to be a significant positive determinant of participation. Parents' political activity had a significant, positive effect on veterans' political activity. 14 The G.I. Bill made a marked difference, even independent of educational level, in promoting participation in a wide range of political organizational memberships and activities during the the slopes to be sufficiently similar to proceed with the analysis of the subsamples.

of relatively small samples (Achen 1982, 46–50).

12 Scholars recognize that the determinants of participation are numerous, and thus it is not surprising to have a relatively low  $R^2$ . It should be noted, however, that the purpose here is not to include all the possible explanatory variables but rather to test those deemed most significant.

&lt;sup>13</sup> Another variant of the preexisting characteristics hypothesis suggests that some behavioral or attitudinal characteristic of G.I. Bill users may have set them apart from non-G.I. Bill users, in turn explaining their different rates of civic memberships. For instance, users may have been more motivated or outgoing than nonusers. Eric Welch and I have utilized a two-stage model to control for such possibilities and found the same results for civic participation, discrediting this hypothesis (Mettler and Welch 2001).

1950s and early 1960s.<sup>15</sup> These findings parallel the results for civic memberships, once again demonstrating the shortcomings of behavioral models that overlook the role of public programs and showing the inadequacy of the passivity explanation.

The fact that the G.I. Bill's educational benefits had an independent effect on subsequent civic memberships and political activity among World War II veterans means that the policy feedback explanation requires more in-depth analysis. The question remains, how might we explain the dynamics through which the G.I. Bill produced such results? Toward that end, I consider the value of the reciprocity thesis and the critical effects thesis.

POLICY FEEDBACK: THE RECIPROCITY THESIS

The interviews provide an opportunity to explore the reciprocity thesis, the possibility that the G.I. Bill fostered among beneficiaries a sense of obligation that led to higher levels of civic participation. First, I consider whether veterans viewed G.I. Bill benefits as a right or a privilege, a distinction that may have a bearing on their response to the benefits. When asked about this, nearly all respondents answered unequivocally that they did not regard the provisions to be a right to which they were entitled. The most common sentiments are summed up in the response of Richard Colosimo, <sup>17</sup> for whom the G.I. Bill benefits covered a bachelor's degree at the University of Pittsburgh and part of a master's degree at the University of Southern California:

I considered it a privilege, a sign of gratitude. I thought, they didn't have to do that. They could have just did like they... did in World War I, where they gave them a bonus and that was it. They could have done that. I think this was a really smart idea and I took it with appreciation.... It was an opportunity. I think anybody that didn't take advantage of it missed out on an opportunity because it was rather magnanimous.

Veterans explained that the G.I. Bill could not be considered a right because military service was an obligation of citizenship for which no recompense was owed. As Robert Foster, whose dental school training at the University of California in San Francisco was funded mostly by the G.I. Bill, articulated, "I think it was more of a way of appreciation than a right. We did what we were supposed to do and we really didn't plan on anything special. It was, of course, a very desirable thing when it came along." Veterans often emphasized the significance of the G.I. Bill in their lives as they explained why they viewed it as such a privilege. Stanley Soloman used the G.I. Bill's vocational education provisions to attend the DeVry School in Chicago, where he became a television repairman. Already married when he used the benefits, he answered, "Well, I guess it was a privilege because [sighs] . . . it was great. It paid for my schooling, paid for my upkeep. We had our own little apartment and I was able to keep it up." Another vocational training beneficiary, Sam Marchesi, became a custom builder through four years of on-the-job training and coursework in architectural drawing and estimating at the Alfred Leonard School in New Rochelle, NY. He described the G.I. Bill as an opportunity:

When we were all coming back at that time a lot of boys had to go to school—to college or to finish grade school. I was 17 when I enlisted; you had to be 18. (You had to lie about your age.) When we were discharged we were all in that same kind of boat. It disrupted [our] education to go to war; I think it was a great thing what the government did—to have this opportunity to pick up where we left off. We had to face the world. We had to make a living.

Paul Parisi, who reported that he would never have attended college without the G.I. Bill, sighed and said simply, "It was one hell of a gift, an opportunity... and I've never thought of it in any other way."

The veterans' widely shared attitude that the G.I. Bill was a privilege rather than something owed in exchange for military service was often paired with a belief that, in receiving the benefits, they incurred no further debt to society. When asked, "After receiving the G.I. Bill benefits, did you think you owed anything back to society?" James Murray, who had been a prisoner of war and who later used the G.I. Bill to attend college at a large public land grant university, replied in a manner that captures the responses of many others. He explained, "I have to be honest, I didn't think about it in those terms. I felt more of it as a reward than [as something for which I] owed back. I figured I'd paid for it. Being there, I saw my friends killed."

When veterans did suggest that they felt a sense of owing back, they emphasized that it was not as an explicit quid pro quo. Isaac Gellert, whose G.I. Bill-sponsored higher education enabled him to became a chemist and college professor, responded, "Yes. In the normal sense in which good citizenship demands that you live in the society and make a contribution to it. Make a contribution not only in your community but also in whatever professional life you have. I regard teaching as an important calling." Another veteran, Paul Parisi, wondered aloud during the interview whether his lifetime of extensive voluntary participation in numerous civic organizations might have been his own attempt to give something back to society after receiving the benefits.

The survey data allow us to explore the reciprocity explanation further. G.I. Bill recipients were asked to indicate, on a four-point scale ranging from strongly disagree (1) to strongly agree (4), their level of agreement with the statement, "It is fair to say that after benefiting from the G.I. Bill, I felt I owed something back to American society." The mean response was 2.9, very close to the "agree" response, with a standard deviation of 0.87. The question remains whether those who experienced an attitudinal response of owing back afterward actually proceeded to participate at higher levels. To evaluate this, I tested a reciprocity version of both the civic and the political models, replacing G.I. Bill use with the variable measuring attitudes about owing something back. This test must be limited to effects among G.I. Bill users only, given the lack of a comparable measure for non-users.

The results, presented in Tables 3 and 4, suggest that the reciprocity model offers a partial explanation for why G.I. Bill beneficiaries participated in civic organizations but not for political activity. Among G.I. Bill recipients in the civic model, the reciprocity variable was surpassed only by parents' civic activity in explaining civic memberships. In the political model, however, parents' political activity and standard of living in childhood were the only significant variables.

These results suggest that the reciprocity thesis has merit, at least with regard to civic memberships. To the extent that G.I. Bill beneficiaries felt a sense of owing something back to American society in return for program usage, they invested their time and energy in civic organizations, contributing to the blossoming of civic life in the midcentury. Subsequent analysis might explore whether this model is most useful for explaining the behavior of particular groups of recipients, based on the type of educational program from which they benefited or the duration of their benefits.

POLICY FEEDBACK: THE CRITICAL EFFECTS THESIS

The critical effects hypothesis suggests that the G.I. Bill had a pronounced impact on civic engagement among veterans from less advantaged socioeconomic backgrounds. In the terms suggested by the theory presented earlier, this outcome could be expected if either of two dynamics were operating through the G.I. Bill: (1) targeted resource effects, to the extent that educational benefits were most consequential for those from low to moderate socioeconomic backgrounds; and (2) targeted interpretive effects, if program design, featuring universal eligibility and routinized procedures, may have bestowed dignity on the same group by including all veterans on an equal basis rather than stigmatizing less advantaged citizens. Here I consider each of these dynamics in turn, then test the critical effects thesis.

To assess critical resource effects, first I consider whether veterans perceived the benefits to be measures that broadened their access to education. Veterans were asked the extent to which they agreed with the proposition that "If the G.I. Bill or Public Law 16 had not existed, I could not have afforded the education or job training that I acquired after military service." 18 Responses were coded from 1 to 4, ranging from strongly disagree to strongly agree. 19 Table 5 presents the cross-tabulation between G.I. Bill users' responses and standard of living in childhood.<sup>20</sup> The table reveals that the lower the veteran's standard of living in the 1920s, the greater the likelihood that he agreed or strongly agreed. From the perspective of majorities of individuals from low to moderate socioeconomic backgrounds, the availability of the G.I. Bill made a marked difference in life opportunities, enabling the pursuit of additional education. Such education is likely to have enlarged beneficiaries' civic capacity appreciably through the skills, income, and networks it fostered subsequently (Verba, Schlozman, and Brady 1995, 433).

Second, I consider whether the G.I. Bill's policy design had critical interpretive effects among those from low or moderate socioeconomic backgrounds. When I asked interview subjects about program administration, those who used the higher education provisions were unanimous in emphasizing the uncomplicated routines involved in qualifying for benefits. Explained George Josten, a University of Illinois alumnus, "We had to apply,... it was processed through some regional office that we lived near and then we simply got a check. I got a check for $75.00 and the school was paid (for tuition) directly. It was an extremely convenient arrangement." Said Anthony Miller, who attended Xavier University and Fordham University, "You just enrolled. I didn't have to do anything. I got $75.00 a month in addition to that. Pretty good!" Several lauded the program as "very well administered." Some who used the vocational training benefits suggested a more cumbersome process. Kermit Pransky, who used the vocational training benefits to learn about motors and subsequently opened his own business in Boston, recalled, "There was a lot of paperwork involved.... It was a lot of red tape, a necessary evil." While the higher education provisions were administered smoothly through the nation's well-established colleges and universities, the vocational provisions necessitated the instantaneous creation of numerous new programs, making implementation more complicated (U.S. Congress 1950, 9, 44–50). Even so, a few mild comments about bureaucratic processes constituted the most negative remarks any veterans made about program administration, and none implied that beneficiaries were stigmatized in any way.

These comments contrasted sharply with veterans' portrayal of social programs targeted for the poor. When asked, "During the Depression, did any New Deal programs affect your family directly?" some who grew up fairly poor stressed how their families attempted to avoid reliance on such programs. Colosimo, who was a first-generation American, commented, "My father did not want to take welfare. He didn't want people to say, 'That foreigner had to come here and take welfare." Richard Werner's father had lost his job in the Depression, causing the family to lose their house on Long Island and forcing them to move to a "coldwater flat" in New York City. He explained, "We were pretty proud. We may have been poor but nobody wanted any of the home relief or any of that." Later, when these same individuals used the G.I. Bill, they experienced a program administered according to standardized, routinized procedures applied uniformly to all veterans regardless of socioeconomic background.<sup>21</sup> The absence of invasive procedures and the universality of coverage elevated the status of less privileged beneficiaries, rather than stigmatizing them in the manner associated with targeted programs for the poor. The highly positive interpretive effects of the G.I. Bill for veterans from less advantaged backgrounds could be expected to have augmented their psychological predisposition most dramatically.

&lt;sup>a</sup>This interactive dummy variable was constructed by multiplying standard of living in the 1920s, where low = 1 and all other values = 0, by G.I. Bill use (coded 1 for use, 0 for nonuse). The three subsequent variables were constructed similarly, in each case with the named standard of living level coded 1 and all others 0. The missing dummy variable features nonuse of the G.I. Bill; this would intersect at the intercept.

Would these resource and interpretive effects of the G.I. Bill boost the civic involvement of those from low to moderate socioeconomic levels? Investigation of this claim, the critical effects hypothesis, requires an interactive version of the civic model. Four dummy variables are included to examine the interaction between each of the separate levels of standard of living in the 1920s, from low to high, and use of the G.I. Bill for education. 22 The results, presented in Table 6, show that the G.I. Bill had an especially significant positive effect on rates of joining civic organizations among veterans whose childhood was spent at a low-medium and a medium standard of living. G.I. Bill users from the mediumhigh and high standard of living backgrounds were also more likely to join, but the relationship registered a lower level of significance. Other results replicated the noninteractive model.

These results suggest that the G.I. Bill had its greatest impact on participation levels among veterans from low to moderate socioeconomic backgrounds. The resources the program extended were likely to have been especially instrumental in enhancing the well-being of such individuals, ameliorating the deterrents to civic activity they experienced in childhood and thus enhancing their civic capacity most dramatically. In addition, the interpretive effects of the G.I. Bill were especially powerful for such veterans, conveying to them a sense of an elevated status in the polity. As a result, they gained a sharper sense of civic duty, feeling that they owed something back to American society. They proceeded to participate in civic organizations at significantly higher levels than would be predicted, becoming a leaven for the vibrant civic associational life Putnam has identified with the 1950s and 1960s.

Conversely, these dual explanations also shed light on why the G.I. Bill did not enhance participation levels more strongly among beneficiaries from higher socioeconomic backgrounds. The resources and skills that promote civic involvement had already been bestowed upon those who grew up in families with a mediumhigh or high standard of living. The G.I. Bill did not change their life course; it only meant that they did not have to pay tuition that they could otherwise have afforded on their own, anyway. Without the power to alter the life circumstances of these beneficiaries, the G.I. Bill had less potential to bestow interpretive effects. Because of their socioeconomic status, these veterans already viewed advanced education as their right.<sup>23</sup> With its power to alter these citizens' rights diminished, the G.I. Bill was less capable of altering their civic identity in terms of participation.

In the case of beneficiaries from the lowest standard of living level, it is likely that the effects of the G.I. Bill were not powerful enough to make up for having had a childhood impoverished of factors that lead to civic activity. Advanced education is likely to have improved their lives in socioeconomic terms but still to have proven inadequate to foster heightened participation. The success of the G.I. Bill in democratizing participation should not rest, however, on whether it completely overpowered the factors that typically influence participation in early adulthood. To expect it to do so would underestimate the considerable power of childhood poverty in deterring subsequent involvement. Further research will be required to understand more precisely how the educational benefits affected such veterans.

Finally, we evaluate the ability of the critical effects hypothesis to explain heightened political participation among G.I. Bill beneficiaries. Table 7 presents an interactive version of the political model with dummy variables combining the effects of having grown up in a certain standard of living stratum with G.I. Bill use. The results show that G.I. Bill use by those who grew up with a low–medium or medium–high to high standard of living in the 1920s had significant effects on political involvement. Once again, parents' political activity also proves highly significant.

Strikingly, as in the case of civic memberships, G.I. Bill users from the low-medium standard of living background received a great boost in political activity.

&lt;sup>22</sup> While I have retained the "standard of living in the 1920s" variable in the model, "use of the G.I. Bill for education" has been dropped. The reason for this is that the theoretical proposition being tested is that the program had effects for specific socioeconomic groups.

&lt;sup>23</sup> This is evidenced by the difference in mean levels of agreement with the statement presented to G.I. Bill users in the survey, "I grew up expecting to go to college." Generally, the higher respondents' standard of living in childhood during the 1920s, the more likely they were to agree with this statement.

The enhancement of participation among those from the medium-high and high standard of living backgrounds reflects what scholars already know about determinants of political participation: They tend to be strongly biased toward the better-off. What stands out as most impressive in these results is that the G.I. Bill had effects besides the commonplace pattern of bestowing more privilege on already privileged individuals. Strikingly, the program enabled individuals who grew up in less advantaged circumstances to participate more fully in public life.

INCORPORATION: FROM SOCIAL RIGHTS TO CIVIC ENGAGEMENT

In recent years, matters of citizenship have received considerable attention in academic and public debate. Two separate conversations have ensued: a rights-oriented variant, which focuses on the social, civil, and political guarantees extended to citizens by the state through law and public policy, and a participation-oriented variant, which is mindful of the extent to which citizens take it upon themselves to participate in civic and political life.

Some political theorists have suggested that social rights and participation may be related, connected through the dynamics of incorporation. Incorporation refers to the extent to which citizens, through the bestowal of rights, are included, consolidated, and organized as members of the community. It is a fundamental task of state building, synonymous with what Judith Shklar (1991) terms "inclusion." The extension of social rights may assure citizens not only of some modicum of well-being, but also of a measure of dignity and value as members of the community (Walzer 1983). If coverage is broad and inclusive, it may promote a shared sense of civic identity and solidarity (Beiner 1995; Kymlicka and Norman 1995), with important consequences for civic and political activity.

As such a policy, the G.I. Bill fostered an incorporation dynamic among World War II veterans and, thus, served as a stimulus for the high levels of civic and political involvement that characterized the postwar era. In keeping with the theory of policy feedback for mass publics, the educational benefits of the program had positive resource and interpretive effects. Through these dynamics, it enhanced beneficiaries' socioeconomic circumstances and skills in ways that heightened their capacity and predisposition for civic involvement. In addition, the program had interpretive effects that altered beneficiaries' sense of obligation to the polity. It did this by offering people a highly positive experience of government and public provision, one that provided them with access to education and treated them with dignity and respect in the process. Thus, the G.I. Bill incorporated recipients more fully as citizens, intensifying their predisposition to participate by joining civic organizations and engaging in a wide range of political activities.

The case of the G.I. Bill illustrates how a public policy can function, like any institution, in promoting norms; in this case, it fostered participatory norms and the development of social capital. In contrast to most determinants of participation, the G.I. Bill promoted civic participation among groups that were somewhat less advantaged in the typical prerequisites for participation. As beneficiaries became more fully incorporated through social rights, they responded through more active forms of participatory citizenship.

NEW DIRECTIONS

The civic consequences of G.I. Bill usage warrant further inquiry. Given that vocational education users are underrepresented in the data utilized here, subsequent analysis must be attentive to how program effects might vary by educational benefit type. A cursory examination reveals that while use of either type functioned as a positive determinant of enhanced civic memberships and political memberships and activity, in fact civic engagement increased most significantly among vocational education users.<sup>24</sup> This suggests that, to the extent that survivorship rates and other factors bias the data used here, the analysis understates both the civic effects of the G.I. Bill and the explanatory power of the critical effects thesis.

Scholars should also examine how the enhanced participation stimulated by the G.I. Bill shaped the character of mid-twentieth-century civic and political life. As individuals became more active in public life, for example, did they participate in cross-class organizations or in groups that reinforced class divisions? Were they more active in widespread, federated organizations that bind members of a nation together through shared ideals and sustain vast leadership networks, or were their affiliations primarily local (Skocpol, Ganz, and Munson 2000)? Finally, given that the generation that came of age with the G.I. Bill appears to have exhibited high levels of civic engagement throughout their lives (Putnam 2000, chap. 14), it is worth examining whether the G.I. Bill had long-term effects beyond the 1950-64 time period. Conceivably, the direct effects of the program for civic involvement may have dissipated over time. They may have been replaced, however, by secondary effects resulting from the greater likelihood of beneficiaries to participate in social institutions that stimulate political activism.

The analytical framework developed here can be used to investigate how the policy designs of a variety of government programs affect civic engagement. Future studies might examine the implications of contemporary approaches to policy design, such as privatization and devolution. Scholars might consider the extent to which the visibility and traceability of government programs affect their civic consequences (Arnold 1990, 47-51; Pierson 1993). Given that tax expenditures constitute a "hidden welfare state" (Howard 1996), does the policy design of generous benefits such as home mortgage benefits, for example, undermine their potential to promote civic activity? Similarly, do federal grants and guaranteed student loans for higher education make recipients more inclined to engage in civic life, or does their delivery system obscure their public origin and weaken their interpretive effects? How do the civic effects of Social Security and Medicare compare to those of market-based pension and health insurance plans? How have the diverse models of welfare reform implemented in the states under the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Act in 1996 affected citizens' sense of their role and place in the political community? Studies of recent programs may allow for more powerful tests of the theory because data can be collected without the constraints posed by issues related to memory, recall, and survivorship. This will permit scholars to rely more on attitudinal data, permitting a fuller analysis of the dynamics underlying policy feedback.

G.I. Bill use has a standardized  $\beta$  coefficient of 0.12 (p < 0.05), and higher education use, 0.15 (p < 0.10). In other regards, the results resemble those in Table 1. In the political version of the model ( $R^2 = 0.07$ , adjusted  $R^2 = 0.06$ ), vocational training has a coefficient of 0.14 (p < 0.05), while the coefficient for higher education is insignificant; other aspects of the model were consistent with those in Table 2.

The lively debates over civic engagement have focused, to date, too exclusively on social determinants of participation. It is time to "bring the state back in" to the study of civic life. Government fosters political learning among citizens through a myriad of policies. The question is, What kinds of lessons and messages do public rules and provisions convey, and through which mechanisms of policy design? This study shows positive effects of one generous program organized by universal principles; scholars should turn their inquiry to a host of other programs to specify more clearly which programs enhance and which deter social capital and why and how such dynamics occur.

APPENDIX A: DEALING WITH MEMORY AND RECALL CONSTRAINTS

Some of the primary potential sources of error in a study of the World War II generation pertain to subjects' memory and ability to recall events that happened several decades ago. These concerns are alleviated to some degree by scholars' understanding that salience matters: That is, people will recall events or activities that were important to them, otherwise known as "landmark events" (Mangione 1995, 34–6; Tourangeau, Rips, and Rasinski 2000, 67–91). It is not important for this study to ascertain specific details from the past, such as the number of Lion's Club or Parent–Teacher Organization meetings a person attended in a given year or the particular elections in which they voted. Rather, I wanted to know whether the subjects were, generally, active participants or not.

The mail survey format does help to limit such concerns, given that a second chance to answer questions is known to stimulate memory (Fowler 1984, 92-3; Tourangeau, Rips, and Rasinski 2000, 94). Veterans could respond at their leisure. taking time to remember past activities. Several additional precautions were taken to reduce errors of recall as much as possible. First, I decided against asking respondents much about past attitudes, given that responses would likely be affected by intervening circumstances. Second, survey researchers have found that greater accuracy is obtained by framing questions for a specific time period; for this purpose, specific responses were requested for each of three periods: 1950-64, 1965-79, and 1980 to the present. This pairing of questions was intended to prompt respondents to consider how their activities might have changed, if at all, and thus to respond to the questions about the earlier period as clearly and thoughtfully as possible. Asking a number of questions about a given time period has proven to facilitate memory; the questions about the immediate postwar years in the survey should have had a cumulative effect.

APPENDIX B: REPRESENTATIVENESS OF THE SAMPLE

Among returning veterans of World War II, 51% used the G.I. Bill for education; in the sample used in this study, 60.8% used the G.I. Bill for education. Among the general population of World War II veterans, 28.6% of those who used the educational provisions pursued higher education, whereas the survey sample included 63.5% such users.

Death rates may account, in part, for these different response rates. Nearly two-thirds of World War II veterans were deceased when the survey was conducted in 1998 (New York Times 2000.) Studies show that in the United States, being better educated is associated with better health and, hence, a longer life expectancy (Ross and Wu 1995). Demographers report a recent increase in longevity among American males that some consider attributable to the effects of the G.I. Bill, inasmuch as it enhanced individuals' socioeconomic well-being. Differential death rates may also be explained by the age disparity of G.I. Bill users and nonusers. Use of the G.I. Bill was inversely related to the age of returning veterans, and those younger veterans are more likely still to be alive and to have responded to the survey (U.S. President's Commission on Veterans' Pensions 1956b, pt. A, 315).

Nonetheless, for the purposes of this study, it is unnecessary for either the ratio of G.I. Bill users to nonusers or the ratio of higher education users to vocational training users to reflect the original population of World War II veterans. Meaningful results are still attainable as long as each group reflects characteristics of the same group in the original population, and effects for both higher education users and vocational training users are considered separately. Determinations about the original population cannot be ascertained from U.S. Census data because it does not include questions about the G.I. Bill. It is possible, however, to compare the sample used here with that from a government survey conducted shortly after G.I. Bill use and drawn from a nationwide random sample of veterans

The veterans who used the G.I. Bill for programs below the college level in this survey resemble those in the earlier study very closely, suggesting that they closely mirror the original population (U.S. President's Commission on Veterans' Pensions 1956b, pt. B, 32). In terms of premilitary education, 28% of both samples had completed elementary school or less and 4% of both samples had four or more years of college. In the new study, 57% had completed high school, compared to 60% in the government study, and 11% had one to three years of college, compared to 8%.

A comparison of veterans who used the G.I. Bill's higher education benefits in both studies revealed that the respondents in the new study had more education prior to military service than those in the 1956 survey. Only 1% had elementary school or less education, compared to 4% in the government study; 47% had finished high school, compared to 68%; 45% had one to three years of college, compared to 21%; and 6% had four or more years of college, compared to 7% (U.S. President's Commission on Veterans' Pensions 1956b, pt. B, 26). The higher levels of premilitary education among subjects in this study suggests that they may have been from more advantaged backgrounds, on average, than the original universe of veterans who used the G.I. Bill benefits for higher education. This would imply that the findings of this study err on the conservative side: The G.I. Bill may have had stronger salutary effects than the findings here suggest.

The Influence of Party: Evidence from the State Legislatures

GERALD C. WRIGHT Indiana University BRIAN F. SCHAFFNER Western Michigan University

merican legislative studies in recent years have been occupied to a large degree with the question of the effects of political parties on the policy behavior of elected legislators, with most of the research focusing on the U.S. Congress. We undertake a comparative analysis of state legislatures for a window into the character and extent of party's effects. Specifically, we compare the impact of party on the partisan polarization and dimensionality of campaign issue stances and roll call voting in the Kansas Senate and the largely comparable, though nonpartisan, Nebraska Unicameral. This comparison offers us a nice quasi-experiment to assess the impact of party by establishing a baseline condition in Nebraska for what happens when party is absent. We argue that party lends order to conflict, producing the ideological low-dimensional space that is a trademark of American politics. Where parties are not active in the legislature—Nebraska is our test case—the clear structure found in partisan politics disappears. This works to sever the connection between voters and their elected representatives and, with it, the likelihood of electoral accountability that is essential for the health of liberal democracy.

olitical parties are widely considered to be necessary for modern democracies. No theorist we know of has, for example, explicitly challenged Schattschneider's (1942, 1) half-century-old proposition that "democracy is impossible save in terms of parties." There is, however, an ongoing controversy among students of legislative policymaking in the United States that implicitly challenges the widespread assumption about the centrality and influence of parties. In his influential book Congress: The Electoral Connection, David Mayhew (1974, 27) offered a theory of congressional behavior based on members pursuing the goal of reelection and he explicitly dismissed the centrality of party. He presents a world of individual political entrepreneurs adapting the rules of the institution to facilitate their primary goal of reelection. At best, parties just assist in this goal. More recently, Keith Krehbiel (1993, 1998) has also challenged the widespread belief that party is central, but from a different angle. His theory is based on the simple assumption that members pursue their personal policy preferences. He concludes that his model—which provides for no role for party at all—accounts for the important observed outcomes and patterns of roll call voting. Indeed, Krehbiel (2000) contends that the findings of most studies that purport to show the strength of partisanship can as easily be interpreted to show that members vote their own preferences. To answer Krehbiel's (1993) question "Where's the Party?" a number of scholars have deployed a variety of data sets and techniques to establish empirically the effects of party (Ansolabehere, Snyder, and Stewart 2001a; Cox and Poole 2001; Lawrence, Maltzman, and Smith 1999; Snyder and Groseclose 2000), and while some contend that their analyses demonstrate that party matters, for a variety of methodological reasons, none of these is conclusive.<sup>1</sup>

The remarkable thing about this controversy, given our prior and long-standing beliefs about the importance of parties in legislative policymaking, is how difficult it has been to establish the impact of parties in Congress. Lawrence, Maltzman, and Smith (1999, 1), for example, characterize the debate as an effort "to measure and describe the modest and contingent effects of party on the behavior of members of Congress." This controversy focuses only on the effects of parties in Congress, but the debate implicitly calls into question the centrality of parties more generally. It is hard to imagine that parties are somehow central for the functioning of democracy as Schattschneider and many others argue while, at the same time, the effects of party in the chief policymaking institution in the United States are marginal and episodic.

We see three limitations in how the problem has been framed, each of which decreases the chances of identifying the effects of party. First, party is examined only within the legislature, most often in terms of unmeasured effects of party leadership on legislative outcomes and roll call voting. This is not necessarily a problem for studying the dynamics within Congress, but it is a sharply delimited view of how party can affect legislative processes. The importance of parties more generally lies in linking voters and their concerns with patterns of policymaking within legislature. A focus only on the effects of party within the chamber misses the impact of parties in connecting voters and the policymaking process.

Second, the tendency to take for granted the simple unidimensional structure of conflict in Congress limits the current debate. Krehbiel's (1993) central argument about the importance of preferences assumes that preferences can be aligned along a single dimension and subsequent efforts to estimate party effects similarly rely on a single-dimensional characterization of preferences or roll call conflict (Aldrich and Battista 2002; Ansolabehere, Snyder, and Steward 2001a: Cox and Poole 2001). This assumption seems reasonable in light of Poole and Rosenthal's (1997) demonstration that historically, with just a couple of exceptions, conflict in Congress has unfolded along a single (evolving) dimension. Nevertheless, this simple structure itself needs to be explained. It defies the theoretical predictions of rational choice theorists, whose models predict much more chaos and less stability than we find (Arrow 1963; Riker 1980). Shepsle (1979) has provided a name for this unexpected condition of regularized conflict, "structurally induced equilibrium," but why this equilibrium is achieved in Congress has yet to be fully established. We argue that the parties play a central role.

Third, the debate has been largely confined to one institution, the U.S. House of Representatives.<sup>2</sup> The difficulty with this is that a one-chamber design holds constant many of the aspects of "party" that may affect the process. Factors such as partisan elections and organization of the legislature or even leadership powers do not vary for one chamber (or vary only modestly over time and then with numerous other factors), thus making it much harder to gauge adequately the effects of party on the legislative process.

In this paper, we seek to join and expand the debate on the importance of party in American legislative politics by adopting a theoretical approach and a research design that gets around these limitations. First, on the theoretical side, we explicitly look at party in both the electoral and the legislative arenas, which leads to incorporating the parties' efforts to win at the ballot box and the consequences of those efforts for the legislative policy process. Second, our consideration of parties in the electoral arena leads us to theorize about and examine the dimensionality of legislative conflict rather than assuming a commonly observed unidimensional structure. Third, we adopt a research design that takes us beyond the Congress to look at the effects of party comparatively in the American states. Our design incorporates an important variation in party by comparing the partisan Kansas Senate with the largely comparable, but nonpartisan Nebraska Unicameral. This comparison yields a nice quasi-experimental design for assessing the role of party in campaigns and within the legislatures.

A WIDER VIEW OF PARTY EFFECTS

Our central premise is that much of the impact of party follows from the central activities of parties in competitive democracies. Of particular concern for an examination of the impact of party on policy behavior is the association between party labels and candidates' issue stances. Many party scholars note that parties are coalitions of more or less like-minded persons pursuing elective office; most studies take this association as a given. But this like-mindedness is not coincidental; the linkage between parties and bundles of issues (which determine who works with which party) is a result of purposive action for political gain (Carmines and Stimson 1989; Karol 2001; Riker 1986). Parties, particularly losing parties, systematically seek out issues that will help them win support from nonparticipants or supporters of the winning party while being constrained by the need to maintain the support of their core constituencies.<sup>3</sup> Thus, over fairly short periods of time, the sides on most any salient controversies become associated with the major parties.

We have seen examples of this through the transformations of the New Deal coalition. Initially defined largely in terms of economics, the Democratic coalition of white Southerners and Northern workers included newly mobilized ethnics. Republicans responded to this majority coalition with their "Southern strategy," which captured many estranged Southern whites who were unhappy with changes in the Democratic party's position on civil rights (Aistrup 1989; Phillips 1969). With Republican appeals to threatened Southern whites, Democrats sought to add newly enfranchised blacks in the South and to mobilize blacks in the North (Carmines and Stimson 1989). Slowly the party coalitions changed to reflect elite issue strategies (Carmines and Layman 1997; Hetherington 2001). And, as part of this change, the issues of civil rights and racial policy came to be tied ideologically, if not logically, with the existing economic concerns and stance of the Democrats, while resistance to increased civil rights legislation became associated with the existing conservatism on economic and welfare policy with which Republicans had long been associated. Subsequently, the parties split on the issues of abortion and the rights of gays and lesbians so that the positions on those issues came to be politically bundled with the parties' existing concerns about economics and race. The association of the various issues the parties have been and are identified with is not perfect and it changes (slowly) over time. We recognize that many citizens are cross-pressured, preferring one of the party's stands on some issues and ... the other party's stands on others. However, these variations from a total alignment of party and issues only underline our major point: Parties link diverse issues, sometimes logically, but also politically as a result of their dynamic searches for electoral advantage.

We now apply this perspective to the role of party in shaping issues stances in campaigns and within the legislatures in the form of roll call voting.

Party and Candidates

Candidates make lots of issue pronouncements in the process of seeking office. Indeed, the essence of electoral campaigns in democratic systems is that candidates and parties will present themselves and the policies they will pursue for the voters to choose between. What should we expect of the ideologies of candidates as they are expressed in campaigns? The assumption of our widely embraced Downsian spatial models is that parties, motivated only for election, will take whatever policy positions maximize their chances of getting elected. The effect of the general electorate in this model is to pull the candidate and parties toward the median voter, resulting in a convergence of candidates or parties (Calvert 1985; Downs 1957). There is strong empirical evidence that candidates gain votes when they take more moderate stands in their districts (Ansolabehere, Snyder, and Stewart 2001b; Canes-Wrone, Brady, and Cogan 2002; Erikson and Wright 1980, 1993, 1997, 2001; Wright and Berkman

The difficulty with the Downsian accounting is that its predictions for convergence are largely wrong. In most contests there is a considerable ideological distance between Democratic and Republican candidates, both overall and within individual contests. This is obvious to most observers at the presidential level and has been confirmed empirically in elections for both houses of Congress (Erikson and Wright 2001; Fiorina 1974; Sullivan and O'Connor 1972; Wright and Berkman 1986).

Some researchers have suggested that this polarization is due to the influence of policy-motivated party activists and core partisans. They are the loudest and most attentive voices within the parties and provide at least three avenues by which their more ideological policy preferences will create a pull toward the parties' centers of gravity. One is through the selection process of the primaries when candidates are first nominated. Activists' and core partisans' issue preferences, which are key components in defining what the parties stand for, are likely to play an important role in who receives the nominations. All other things being equal, we expect voters, including primary voters, to cast their support for candidates who best mirror their issue preferences. Second, candidates are much more likely to obtain support from the politically active and ideological segment of the citizenry than from the larger, but more quiescent group of moderates, weak identifiers, and independents. Third, the candidates themselves are more likely to emerge from this activist stratum within the parties than from the general citizenry. As such, we fully expect that candidates' personal issue preferences genuinely reflect, for the most part, those associated with their parties. Thus, through the formal mechanism of the primary election and through the informal mechanisms of ideologically contingent support and socialization, we expect that party activists and core partisans exert a pull on candidate issue positions away from the more moderate preferences of the median voters in their districts.

This argument has been laid out formally by Aronson and Ordeshook (1972) and Aldrich (1983; Aldrich and McGinnis 1989) and empirical work has demonstrated that state party elite ideology together with measures of the ideological preferences of the general public nicely accounts for party differences between candidates for both the House and the Senate (Wright 1989, 1994). Parties pull candidates toward ideological extremes, while the electoral preferences of the median voter pull candidates toward greater moderation. The key in this process is the strategic point at which party activists and core partisans exert their influence—in the socialization that precedes candidate emergence and in the nomination stage, both of which occur before the general election.<sup>4</sup>

We also expect that parties have an effect on the dimensionality of the issue stances candidates take. This influence might occur through two processes—by influencing candidates' issue stances and by affecting which candidates run. In the first process, if a candidate embraces his/her party's positions on issues A, B, and C, but has little strong feeling on issue D, the fact that the party has an expected position on D would make it more likely that the candidate would take his/her party's position on D than that of the opposition. This may be because the party acts as a positive reference group for the candidate, and it could also be that strategically taking the correct and expected position on D increases one's acceptability to party regulars, ideological contributors, and primary voters. The process of being associated with a party—which is publicly defined in terms of explicit policy stances—has the effect of bringing about ideological constraint as one learns to "be a part of the team."

The second process that could affect the dimensionality of candidates' issue preferences is simple selection, including self-selection. Nominations are affected by policy-motivated activists, and thus to the extent that candidate ideology is important, those who have more consistently liberal issue stances stand a better chance of getting the Democratic nomination and more consistent conservatives fare better in getting the Republican nomination. Those with a mixed ideological position who do not reflect a recognizable set of party stances will have a hard time getting nominated. Thus, the selection process yields an "electoral class" that presents issues in a low-dimension issue space—simplified along the traditional partisan/ideological spectrum.

Party and Legislators

We next come to the arena that has been more the focus of the "Where's the party?" controversy, the party in the legislature. The contention is over the extent to which the party, as a caucus or through party leaders, can induce would-be moderates or defectors to support the party's position on issues when, left to their own, they would vote their own preferences or those of their constituencies. What has not been widely considered is the impact of party on defining the structure of conflict across issues. While there is some attention to agenda control, most observers seem to accept as given the low dimensionality of the issue space documented by Poole and Rosenthal (1997, 2001). Aldrich (1995, 207) identified the problem: "Floor majorities could be fashioned on any number of bases. The trick is to ensure that it is done according to a primarily partisan definition of the alternatives." We believe that the mere existence of competitive parties—in the electorate and in the organization of the legislature—operates to increase the salience of party so that it becomes an effective "default cleavage" for the legislature. Because the parties have prior positions on most important issues, there is likely to be a strong tendency—as members of competing teams—to view policy first, and perhaps foremost, in partisan/ideological terms. This process does not eliminate other considerations—there can always be some issues that cut across party lines—but party as a default cleavage may go a long way in framing the policy choices that legislators make. The result of such a process is a greatly attenuated issue space, with majorities forming most often along one liberal-conservative dimension. The important point here is that by effectively casting policy controversies in "we-they" terms, and where the "we" has a prior association with distinct issue stances, there can be a great deal of cohesion within the parties on substantive issues even without explicit efforts by the party or its leaders to steer members' voting decisions on bills.

The Influence of Party June 2002

Our view of the effects of party encompasses two arenas and two aspects of policy behavior. In the next section we undertake a comparative analysis to assess empirically the operation of party in the contexts of elections and legislative voting, paying attention in each to both levels of polarization and to the dimensionality of the issue space.

DESIGN

Although most of the work on the impact of party has looked at the House of Representatives, a comparative approach offers distinct advantages. To specify effectively the conditions under which party has certain kinds of effects, we need to look at its operation in contexts in which the character, powers, and perhaps tradition of partisanship vary. Cox (2000) takes such a perspective in addressing the question of when legislative rules make a difference, contrasting the very strong party systems in much of Europe with the weaker but still substantial parties in the U.S. Congress and the much weaker parties in Latin American democracies. We stay closer to home by taking the question to the state legislatures. Specifically, we use a paired comparison in which the chief difference between the legislatures we examine is the presence or absence of parties

Nebraska, with its nonpartisan legislature, provides us with a wonderful test case. Our comparison legislature is the Kansas Senate. The Nebraska Unicameral and the Kansas Senate are about the same size (49 and 40 members) and the states they serve are similar in demography and overall partisanship and ideological leanings (Schaffner, Streb, and Wright 2001). Three studies suggest that nonpartisanship will make a difference. Jenkins (1999, 2000) finds less structure and less ideological polarization in roll call voting in the Confederate House, which did not have political parties, than in the U.S. House during the Civil War. Welch and Carlson (1973) examine five sessions of the Nebraska legislature distributed across a 50-year period. Using Guttman Scales to establish roll call dimensions, they find a lot of small dimensions, none very strong, that do not correlate with much of anything. They conclude that nonpartisanship in Nebraska leads to numerous majorities. Aldrich and Battista (2002) look at roll call voting in eight state legislatures, including Nebraska. They find that there is little form or definition to the NOMINATE scores of Nebraska's state senators' roll call voting, but party does a good, but variable, job of structuring the main dimension of roll call voting in other chambers.

ANALYSIS

Partisanship and Ideology in the Campaigns

We first consider the relationship of party to how candidates reveal their issue stances in their electoral campaigns. For the Kansas Senate, we expect the impact of partisanship to reflect the impact we find in elections for the U.S. House of Representatives. We hypothesize that the partisan character of the elections will work to produce an issue space that is dominated by the familiar liberal-conservative continuum and that the pressures of party activists, primaries, and contributors will reinforce socialization patterns to yield polarized candidates. In contrast, in Nebraska, where parties are taken out of the picture, we expect a less structured issue space since the parties are not actively bundling the issues in state legislative elections, and further, we expect that Democratic and Republican candidates will be less polarized than in Kansas.

To assess electorally expressed ideologies we make use of the data collected by Project Vote Smart (PVS).<sup>5</sup> We use the 1996 survey for the Kansas Senate, when all seats were up for reelection, and the 1996 and 1998 surveys for Nebraska because only half of the Unicameral's 49 seats are up in any given election year. There is sufficient continuity in the questionnaires that using respondents from different years for Nebraska does not present any comparability problems.<sup>6</sup> The response rates for the PVS "National Political Awareness Tests" (NPATs) are not great. Even with PVS's considerable efforts to follow up with pleas—and sometimes threats—to get candidates to fill out the questionnaires, the response rates for the states nationally are only about 35%, although the rates for Kansas and Nebraska were a better. We have 34 respondents from Kansas and 49 for Nebraska. Here we use a subset of items of the PVS NPAT that were selected for a comparison between Kansas and Nebraska. All items in this subset are constant across the years (1996 and 1998) and the two states. We include 23 items spread across the areas of crime, the economy, education, the environment, gun control, health care, social issues, budget priorities, and abortion (see the Appendix for a listing).

&lt;sup>6</sup> The PVS National Political Awareness Test (NPAT) is composed of two parts for each state. The larger part is a "core NPAT," which asks a large battery of questions common to all the states, and the second is made up of sets of questions that tap controversies particular to

The items for each state were scaled using Poole and Rosenthal's (1997) W-NOMINATE program. NOMI-NATE is similar in some ways to factor analysis, though its foundation is based explicitly on the spatial model. The first step in using the NOMINATE procedure is to determine the number of relevant dimensions of the issue space sampled by the PVS questionnaires. Poole and Rosenthal typically find one, sometimes two, dimension in congressional voting, and in comparative analysis two dimensions are almost always adequate to describe the structure of the space. Ansolabehere, Snyder, and Stewart (2001a) apply the Heckman-Snyder factor analysis procedure to a set of congressional PVS NPATs. The Heckman-Snyder procedure yields similar fits with roll call data as does Poole and Rosenthal's NOMINATE procedure. Ansolabehere, Snyder, and Stewart find that one dimension also dominates the PVS congressional NPAT and that this dimension correlates very highly with the major roll call dimension they extract. At least for Congress, incumbents' ideologies as expressed in the campaigns and in roll voting are very similar in value and structure (see also Erikson and Wright 1997, 2001).

Our immediate purpose here is to assess the relative structures of these sets of issues and then to determine the levels of partisan polarization in the two states. Table 1 shows the outcome of applying the W-NOMINATE procedure to the PVS data for candidates in Kansas and Nebraska. First, the percentage correctly classified is just that—the percentage of candidates' NPAT responses that the dimension predicted correctly. The percentage of correctly classified responses in each state gives us our first comparison between ideology in Nebraska and that in Kansas as measured in the campaigns. The first dimension in both states correctly classified just over 80% of the responses.

While somewhat informative, the percentage correctly classified can be misleading. If 25% of Nebraska candidates chose the minority position in these questionnaires, then correctly classifying 75% would not be an improvement over simply guessing that everybody chose the majority position. The second statistic, the aggregate proportional reduction in errors (APRE) takes this into account (Heckman and Snyder 1997; Poole and Rosenthal 1997). This number is equal to one minus the number of errors divided by the number of candidates choosing the minority position. Returning to Table 1, the APRE for the first dimension in Kansas is 0.413, while the APRE for Nebraska is lower, at 0.331. In both states we find one substantial dimension that accounts for 80% of the item responses, followed by smaller dimensions. The second dimension in Nebraska is a bit clearer, adding 5% to the correct classifications. compared to the second dimension, which adds just 3% in Kansas.8 The pattern of candidate positions on the first two dimensions is shown in the plots of Figure 1. We have added letter symbols to the candidates to show the pattern of partisan affiliations in the space (D, Democrat; R, Republican; and I, independents and third-party candidates).9 The first dimension, which we believe reflects the clear liberal-conservative content of the items in the NPAT arrays Republicans against Democrats, with Republicans showing a strong tendency to score higher than Democrats. There is some variation on the dimension among both Democrats and Republicans in the two states. However, the striking feature of the pattern in these findings is the lack of support for our hypothesis of less structured responses as a result of the nonpartisanship of Nebraska elections. On the NPAT responses, the two states are more alike than they are different.

The second hypothesis about partisanship and ideology in the campaign was that the existence of partisan primaries and the overall involvement of the parties in Kansas' elections should have yielded a pull toward the ideological poles of the parties compared to Nebraska, where the parties are barely active in each state. We construct our scales using the core NPAT items, which stayed virtually the same for 1996 and 1998.

The Influence of Party June 2002

the state legislative elections. Table 2 shows the simple regressions of the first two dimensions on party affiliation (Democrat = 1, Republican = 0) for each state. The results are as striking as they are surprising. Partisan Kansas actually shows a lower party difference on the main dimension (-0.87) than we find in Nebraska (-1.07). Reflecting this, we also see that party affiliation explains much more of the variance on the first dimension in Nebraska (adjusted  $R^2$  value of 0.64, vs. 0.45 for Kansas). On both counts, then, dimensionality and polarization, our hypothesizing was considerably off. In nonpartisan Nebraska, differences between Democrats and Republicans are similar to those in partisan Kansas, and the issue response sets are similarly structured in the two states. If anything, Nebraska actually shows more partisan polarization on the main NPAT dimension than Kansas does.

As shown in Table 2, party affiliation has virtually no association with the second dimension, which is true for the subsequent dimensions, all of which appear to be more noise collectors than substantively meaningful measures. Below we speculate on what might be going on here, but what is clear is that the nonpartisanship of Nebraska state legislative elections did not affect the dimensionality of candidates' electorally expressed ideology, nor did nonpartisanship in Nebraska yield less ideological polarization between Democratic and Republican candidates.

Partisanship and Ideology in Roll Call Voting

The high level of polarization among Nebraska candidates for the state legislature was not expected since theory suggested, and the earlier research by Welch and Carlson (1973) demonstrated, quite modest correlations of partisanship with roll call voting in the Nebraska legislature. When we found the high campaign issue polarization between partisans in Nebraska, we began to suspect that partisanship had finally found its way into Nebraska legislative politics. Was it possible that Nebraska's legislators, after years of wandering in the confusing maze of unstructured and unstable coalitions documented by Welch and Carlson (1973), had responded to the need for organization and continuity that party provides, even while remaining constitutionally nonpartisan? We can see if that was the case as we test our hypotheses about the relationship of party and roll call voting in the Kansas Senate and the Nebraska Unicameral.

Our analysis includes all even mildly contentious roll calls in the two chambers for the 1999-2000 session, defined here as any roll call in which the losing side constituted as least 5% of those voting. This resulted in 223 votes in the Nebraska legislature and 254 in the Kansas Senate. As with the PVS NPAT data, we calculate W-NOMINATE scores to assess the dimensionality of conflict in the two chambers. Table 3 shows our results from extracting four dimensions. The overall results show that, unlike the NPAT data, patterns of roll call voting are not the same in the two bodies. The percentage of correctly classified votes in each state gives us our first indication of the differences between Nebraska and Kansas. While the first dimension in Kansas correctly classifies over 88% of the votes, the first dimension in Nebraska succeeds less than 76% of the time.

The big difference, however, is found in the APRE scores. The APRE for the first dimension for Kansas is 0.463 and this increases to 0.559 in two dimensions. These are very close to the average values that Poole and Rosenthal (1997) find for the U.S House and Senate.<sup>10</sup> The first dimension in Kansas explains a great deal and the second dimension improves on that slightly. There is clearly one dominant dimension to roll call voting in the Kansas Senate.

In contrast, patterns in Nebraska's roll call voting are difficult to find. The APRE for Nebraska's first dimension, 0.196, is much lower than that of Kansas. Indeed. such a low APRE indicates just a nominal improvement over a naive prediction of guessing that everyone voted with the winning side. While the second dimension improves upon that APRE score by 0.098, the APRE after two dimensions (0.294) is still far less than that of just one dimension in Kansas. The unusual character of the Nebraska legislature can be seen against the backdrop of Poole and Rosenthal's (2001) comparative statistics on 12 legislatures including the U.S. Congress, the UN, the European Parliament, and the legislatures of several European countries. The APRE for all four dimensions for Nebraska's legislature is lower than the lowest APRE Poole and Rosenthal find for the first dimension of any of the 12 voting bodies in their study.

Table 4 presents results from OLS regressions of the first two dimensions for Kansas and Nebraska. The independent variables in this analysis are the party of the legislator (1 = Democrat, 0 = Republican) and whether the legislator's district is rural or urban (1 = Urban, 0 = Rural). The inclusion of party is obvious, but many state legislatures, including Kansas and Nebraska are noted for significant urban-rural urban cleavages (Loomis 1994; Welch and Carlson 1973). Therefore, we include this measure to test whether this factor shapes voting in Nebraska and Kansas. 11

The results in Table 4 confirm our hypotheses. The first dimension of voting in Kansas is clearly a partisan cleavage. The coefficient for party in this model is strong and significant. On a scale ranging from -1 to 1, &lt;sup>10</sup> The APRE values for the one-, two-, and three-dimension solutions for the U.S. House are 0.479, 0.531, and 0.546, and for the Senate they are 0.435, 0.519, and 0.530 (from Poole and Rosenthal 1997, Table 3, 28).

<sup>11</sup> We created our dummy variable of urban versus rural legislative districts by examining the population density of the counties these districts intersected. There were 25 urban and 24 rural districts in Nebraska and 26 urban and 14 rural districts in Kansas.

the coefficient of -1.27 for party (and the adjusted  $R^2$  of 0.87 for the model) represents a substantial difference between Democrats and Republicans. In addition to its impact on the first dimension in Kansas, party also has a significant influence on the second dimension. While this coefficient is not as strong as in the first dimension, it does reinforce the impact of party in the Kansas Senate. In addition to party, the coefficient for urbanism is also significant for this second dimension. Thus, both dimensions of voting in Kansas are highly structured by partisanship, with the second also being influenced by district urbanism.

While the first dimension in Kansas is a clear partisan cleavage, there appears to be no clear pattern to the first dimension in Nebraska. Neither party nor urbanism is a significant predictor of a legislator's position on this spectrum and Figure 2 indicates the lack of any obvious cleavage as well—legislators are evenly spread across the dimension. On the other hand, dimension 2 does appear to be structured to some extent by both party and urbanism. While the coefficient for party in this case is only a third that for party on Kansas's first dimension, there does appear to be some relationship of party with this dimension; a dimension that captures only a small portion of the voting decisions of the Nebraska legislature in any case.

We find, then, convincing evidence of quite different structures of roll call voting in the Kansas Senate and the Nebraska legislature. The two dimensions explaining roll call voting in Nebraska have an APRE of just 0.294, compared to the APRE of 0.559 for Kansas's two dimensions. This difference indicates far less structure in the Nebraska legislature. Furthermore, while the first dimension was clearly partisanship in Kansas, we could find no pattern—partisan or otherwise—that could explain the first dimension in Nebraska. <sup>12</sup> Thus, our findings are clear—cohesive partisan cleavages form in the partisan Kansas Senate, while such partisan divisions are minor and inconsistent in the nonpartisan setting. Our empirical conclusions echo those of Welch and Carlson (1973, 865) "that there is relatively little structure in voting in Nebraska."

DISCUSSION

From these empirical results, we are faced with an apparent puzzle. In Kansas we find reasonable structure and polarization in the PVS NPAT data and this is reflected even more clearly in the roll call patterns of the Kansas Senate. But in Nebraska, we find the same familiar structure and even greater partisan polarization in the NPAT data, only to see the Nebraska legislators vote with each other across issues almost at random. Many of the votes on bills in the Nebraska Unicameral seem unrelated to any enduring cleavages.

One possible explanation for the findings is that our samples of individuals in the NPAT and roll call analyses are different. This could happen because only a subset of incumbents answers the NPATs. However, when we compare the subsamples of those for whom we have both NPAT and roll call data to those for whom

When we showed a list of names and scores on the first dimension to a colleague familiar with the legislature in Nebraska, he did not see any logic to the dimension. We believe that there is probably something there, but it is not partisanship or the urban/rural split—and it does not account for much of the voting patterns in the legislature.

we have only NPAT scores and only roll call scores, we find no evidence of any comparability problems. <sup>13</sup> A second comparability problem that could explain our findings is if Kansas and Nebraska simply considered different kinds of issues, with Kansas' being more susceptible to party-line voting. To check this possibility we classified all the roll calls in our analysis by issue area using the categories developed by Welch and Carlson (1979). Figure 3 shows that the distributions across areas are quite similar, and we find nothing in the

<sup>13</sup> To check for the possibility that those in the legislature for whom we have roll call data might somehow be systematically different from those who took the NPAT, we first established three groups determined by the type of data we have for them: group 1, only NPAT scores (17 in Kansas, 20 in Nebraska); group 2, both NPAT and roll call NOMINATE scores (17 in Kansas, 26 in Nebraska); and group 3, only roll call scores (23 in Kansas, 22 in Nebraska). We then estimated where N is the NOMINATE scores for the NPATs or roll calls and G2 is a dummy variable for group 2. When N is the NPAT scores the comparison is between group 1 and group 2 (group 3 is missing data), and when N is the roll call scores the comparison is between group 2 and group 3. This analysis was run for all four of the NPAT and roll call NOMINATE dimensions for both states. Of 32 chances for  $b_2$  or  $b_3$  to be significant, only one coefficient achieved the 0.05 level, and that was on the fourth roll call dimension for Nebraska—easily attributable to chance. Thus, we are quite confident that the explanation for the differences in structure between the NPATs and the roll calls for Nebraska are institutional rather than differences between who answered the NPATS and who cast roll call votes.

few differences in the distributions that could explain the huge differences in patterns of roll call coalitions. If anything, Nebraska should have a higher level of partisan/ideological voting, with its slightly higher proportions of bills in the education, social welfare, and revenue/taxation categories. Based on these analyses, we are confident that the differences in roll call voting are not an artifact, especially in light of the parallel findings from other studies, with Kansas' patterns looking pretty much like Congress and Nebraska's pattern being entirely consistent with Welch and Carlson's and Aldrich and Battista's analyses.

Here we offer an explanation for our findings. It derives from our view of party as a device for creating order among the myriad of conflicts and issues that citizens and politicians face. As we stated earlier, we believe that party, under the right conditions, operates as a default cleavage, and when issues are interpreted in terms of this underlying cleavage the dimensionality of the issue space is reduced. The key, we believe, is in understanding the differential salience of the party/ideology linkage in different contexts. Differences in the context of the gathering of the NPAT data and roll call voting in the Kansas Senate and the Nebraska Unicameral provide a plausible explanation for our seemingly anomalous findings.

Our big inconsistent finding is the high level of structure and polarization among candidates for the Nebraska legislature. These actually make sense upon some reflection as we consider both the character of the PVS effort and the backgrounds of the candidates themselves. Project Vote Smart constructs the questionnaires based on extensive research on the political controversies their researchers locate across the states. Legislators face the issues, from abortion and affirmative action to crime and welfare, over and over again in the states. As such, the parties have already staked out their general positions on the vast majority of these. The items are presented as clear policy choices about which courses of action the candidates endorse. The principle behind the entire effort is to highlight the essential stances of the candidates and what they stand for. Although not intended to do so, by reflecting existing political conflicts in the states, the NPATs probably promote answering items in terms of the underlying and recurring political choices as framed in current American politics. Not answering questions in a way that roughly aligns in a general liberal-conservative dimension would probably mean that the respondent does not accept the common terms of discourse in contemporary American politics.14

This is reinforced by the candidates themselves. The nonpartisan Nebraska legislature exists within a highly partisan context. Almost all of the candidates for the legislature have a recognized affiliation with one of the two major parties. Most are registered as partisans, and the newspapers frequently refer to their party affiliation along with their town or county when identifying members. When one legislator died, the Omaha paper listed 25 people who wanted to be considered as his replacement; 23 were identified by party (Hicks 1999). Hence, the candidates are partisans when they run, but they do not appear to run as partisans (Schaffner, Streb, and Wright 2001). Given the context in which the NPATs are constructed and the emersion of the candidates in the same larger culture, it is no wonder that they respond to PVS questions in the same way that the partisan candidates in other states do.

The patterns we found for roll call voting are sharply at odds with the patterns of the NPAT. Differences in context here also account for the use of party as a default cleavage in the Kansas Senate but not in the Nebraska Unicameral. In Kansas, candidates run as Democrats and Republicans, and once elected, they organize the legislature as partisans. The election and the distribution of power in the legislature are a zero-sum game between the two parties. This fact of an institutional life of recurring partisan conflict and competition makes party a natural and salient default cleavage. Then, as the parties, at least nationally, are already clearly associated with positions and groups on a wide range of issues, it becomes much more likely that the ideological/partisan component of any bill will draw attention rather than other facets of the issue around which alternative majorities might form.

In Nebraska party does not play this role. Members enter the legislature having been Democrats or Republican in the past, but we know that partisan identity plays little part in election to the legislature (Schaffner, Streb, and Wright 2001). By all accounts, the parties play only a modest, if any, role in state legislative elections. Organization of the chamber is accomplished through anonymous vote by all members, not by party caucuses. 15 Thus, members' identities as partisans are not salient to their lives in the legislature, so when bills come up, there is no ongoing default cleavage. It seems almost as though each bill is considered anew rather than in the context of established sides and coalitions. Rather than having a partisan/ideological cleavage to block out other possible bases for division, members can, and apparently do, focus on any aspect that strikes them. As we have seen in the regression analysis, sometimes this pits Democrats against Republicans, sometimes urban against rural representatives. But a lot of the time, it is not at all clear what the lines of division are, and whatever they are, they do not have much continuity from one issue to the next. We believe that the important factor here is that the lack of party organization and agendas means that no one has an incentive to promote a package of legislation on which they as a group will run. Issues do not get tied together around which coalitions form as in partisan legislatures.

Before accepting these results, however, it is reasonable to ask why party coalitions do not form in Nebraska. The answer, we believe, is twofold. First, party labels are constitutionally prohibited, and in subpresidential elections voters do not connect their partisan preferences with candidates unless party labels are actually listed on the ballot (Schaffner, Streb, and Wright 2001). Additionally, candidates seldom emphasize their party affiliations. We know that even candidates running in partisan elections generally avoid mention of their party except when appealing to partisan supporters. It is certainly rare for party to be a central element in this era of candidate-centered elections. This should apply even more where there is a tradition of nonpartisanship. Second, coalitions do not form in the Nebraska legislature because incumbent legislators have nothing to gain electorally from partisanship; incumbency is worth more at the ballot box when it is unaccompanied by party labels (Schaffner, Streb, and Wright 2001). Nebraska legislators apparently are aware of this, as they have resisted efforts by the state party organizations to return the legislature to partisan elections (Sittig 1997, 196).

CONCLUSIONS

Our findings highlight two points about parties in legislatures. First, we believe that party plays a role that has largely been missed in the literature. Poole and Rosenthal (1997) convincingly demonstrate a very low dimensionality in roll call voting in the U.S. Congress through most of our history. But what brings about this low dimensionality? Most studies have taken this crucial factor as given. Some, however, suggest that this low dimensionality is imposed by party leaders within the legislature (Jenkins 1999, 2000; Poole and Rosenthal 1997). We believe that this explanation is incomplete. The stability and structure of coalitions in the U.S. Senate are every bit what they are in the House of Representatives, despite much weaker party leadership. The explanation, therefore, probably lies elsewhere. Our analysis provides strong evidence that the parties, in vying for electoral advantage, adopt positions on new issues to bring in new voters and, thus, package these with their existing issue stands. This provides a political connection among issues, which works its way into our general ideological way of looking at politics. Without parties, there would be no need to bundle these diverse issues, and legislators, activists, and the media would be much less likely to see any obvious connections among them. Our argument, in short, is that parties produce the ideological low-dimensional space as a by-product of their efforts to win office. Where the parties are not active in the legislature-Nebraska is our test case—the clear structure found in partisan legislatures disappears.

&lt;sup>15</sup> The 1997 state legislature reelected a Democrat as its speaker by a vote of 38–10 despite the fact that the state Republican Chairman actively lobbied Republican members (who held a 26–22 advantage in the legislature) to vote for the Republican candidate (Hord 1997). According to the "A Victory for Independence." 1997. Omaha World-Herald. 10 Jan: A-10. "While party-line votes occasionally occur, they are not the rule."

Second, we wish to make the point in our conclusion that nonpartisanship undermines the possibilities for popular control of government. This occurs in several ways. Elsewhere, research has indicted that nonpartisan elections cause lower turnouts, make it easier for incumbents to win elections, and effectively disenfranchise the poorest and least educated citizens (Schaffner and Streb 2000; Schaffner, Streb, and Wright 2001). <sup>16</sup> Our analysis here adds to that indictment.

The disjuncture between the PVS NPAT responses and the Nebraska legislative voting patterns shows that legislators there are not connecting their clear ideological preferences on the issues to the bills that they vote on in the legislature. Indeed, it is difficult to imagine how voters could achieve even general policy direction when conflict patterns in the legislature are unstable and unstructured. Together these findings suggest that nonpartisan elections effectively break the policy linkage between citizens and their representatives in the statehouse. Our findings echo and lend solid empirical support to the Schattschneider observation we quoted at the outset about the importance of party for coherence and accountability in democratic politics. Both are lacking in Nebraska's nonpartisan legislature but are evident in Kansas' Senate. The difference is the existence of party.

APPENDIX: PVS NPAT ITEMS ANALYZED

We used the following 23 items in analyzing NPAT responses among candidates in Kansas and Nebraska. The first section of NPAT questions asks the respondent to indicate the statements with which he or she agrees. Because NOMINATE requires dichotomous choices (such as votes), we coded agreeing with the statement as an affirmative response and not agreeing with the statement as a negative response.

Crime

- Oppose the death penalty
- Increase state funds for programs that rehabilitate and educate inmates during and after prison sentences

Economy

- Provide low-interest loans and tax credits for expanding, starting up, or relocating businesses
- Reduce state government regulations on the private sector
- Support limits on cash damages in lawsuits against businesses and professionals for product liability or malpractice
- Încrease state funding for programs to retrain unemployed workers

Education

- Provide parents with state-funded vouchers to send their children to any participating school (public, private, religious, technical)
- Support sex education programs that stress safe sexual practices

Environment

- Require the state to reimburse citizens when statesponsored environmental regulations limit the use of privately owned land
- [Continue to] Provide funding for recycling programs in [state]
- Suspend [state]'s participation in unfunded, federally mandated environmental protection legislation

Gun Control

- Increase state restrictions on the purchase and possession of firearms
- Maintain all state registration procedures and state restrictions on possessing firearms
- Ease state procedures and restrictions on the purchase and registration of firearms

Health Care

- Ensure that [state]'s citizens have access to basic health care, through managed care, insurance reforms, or statefunded care where necessary
- Limit the amount of damages that can be awarded in medical malpractice lawsuits

Social Issues

Increase state funding for programs to prevent teen pregnancy

&lt;sup>16</sup> See Welch and Carlson 1973 and the works summarized in Cassel 1986, as well as the articles cited in Schaffner, Streb, and Wright 2001.

Abortion

Because the abortion questions are interrelated, we coded five responses into a single dichotomous choice. The following two choices were coded as an affirmative response.

- Abortions should always be legally available.
- Abortions should be legally available when the procedure is completed within the first trimester of pregnancy.

The remaining three choices were coded as a negative response.

- Abortions should be legal only when the pregnancy resulted from incest or rape or when the life of the woman is endangered.
- Abortions should always be illegal.
- Abortions should be limited by waiting periods and parental notification requirements.

Budget

Candidates were asked to support a particular level of funding for education, environment, health care, law enforcement, and welfare. The funding options were to eliminate, greatly decrease, slightly decrease, maintain status, slightly increase, and greatly increase. Because NOMINATE requires dichotomous data, we bundled responses into eliminate/decrease and maintain/increase.

Taxes

Candidates were asked to support a particular tax level for alcohol taxes, capital gains taxes, income taxes for those earning less than $75,000, income taxes for those earning more than $75,000, property taxes, and sales taxes. The tax options were to eliminate, greatly decrease, slightly decrease, maintain status, slightly increase, and greatly increase. Because NOMINATE requires dichotomous data, we bundled responses into eliminate/decrease and maintain/increase.

The Slant of the News: How Editorial Endorsements Influence Campaign Coverage and Citizens' Views of Candidates

KIM FRIDKIN KAHN AND PATRICK J. KENNEY Arizona State University

ne of the essential elements of an impartial press in the United States is the "wall of separation" between the editorial pages and the pages devoted to the news. While the political beliefs of newspaper owners and editors are clearly articulated on opinion pages, their views are not supposed to infiltrate the reporting of the news. The analyses presented in this paper raise questions about this claim. We examine newspaper coverage of more than 60 Senatorial campaigns across three election years and find that information on news pages is slanted in favor of the candidate endorsed on the newspaper's editorial page. We find that the coverage of incumbent Senators is most affected by the newspaper's endorsement decision. We explore the consequences of "slanted" news coverage by showing that voters evaluate endorsed candidates more favorably than candidates who fail to secure an editorial endorsement. The impact of the endorsement decision on voters' evaluations is most powerful in races receiving a great deal of press attention and among citizens who read their local newspaper on a daily basis.

he First Amendment and scores of Supreme Court decisions accord newspapers broad leeway about what information to print concerning politics. Not surprisingly, with so few restrictions, the press has remade itself several times during the last 250 years. Today, newspaper coverage of political events and public policy conforms to the canons of "professional journalism." These include, for example, a code of ethics concerning the rights and responsibilities of the press in a democracy, the formation of structured education for aspiring journalists, and a series of norms and rules that define the general practice of gathering the news.

This constellation of characteristics is supposed to produce the fair and balanced reporting of the news. Today, the professional journalist assumes "the role of a politically neutral adversary, critically examining all sides of an issue and thereby assuring the impartial coverage of the broadest range of issues" (Bennett 1988, 120). It is expected that professional journalists subordinate their political leanings in pursuit of professionalism (Davis 1996).

One of the essential elements of an impartial press is the impenetrable wall between the editorial pages and the pages devoted to the news. This "wall of separation" is critical to the establishment of a fair and impartial press. While the political beliefs of newspaper owners and editors are articulated clearly on opinion pages, their views are not supposed to infiltrate the reporting of the news. According to journalistic norms, the information on the news pages is reported objectively and free from pressure or direction by the people who own and run the newspapers. According to the executive editor of the Washington Post, Leonard Downie, Jr., the news department at the Post follows the paper's formal ethics policy that "the separation of news columns from the editorial pages . . . is solemn and complete" (Seib 1994, 119). A routine practice at most major newspapers in this country is for editors and reporters who cover the daily news to have nothing to do with endorsement decisions or other opinions printed on the editorial page. Likewise, the editorial page editors have no involvement in the coverage of the news (Seib 1994).

The concept of the "wall" is preached faithfully in journalism classes across the country and is a widely held norm within the newspaper industry. In this paper, we examine the integrity of the wall by investigating the relationship between newspapers' editorial decisions and the tone of their news coverage. We examine newspaper coverage of more than 60 Senatorial campaigns across three election years.

Our analysis has important implications for the role of the modern press during campaigns. Historically, the press has played two crucial roles during elections. First, it has been a conduit of information between citizens and candidates. Indeed, most of what citizens know about candidates comes from the news media (e.g., Graber 1997; Paletz 1999). Furthermore, candidates often look to the press to disseminate their messages to potential supporters (e.g., Just et al. 1996; Kahn and Kenney 1999).

Second, the press structures the discourse of political campaigns by emphasizing certain topics over others (e.g., Iyengar and Kinder 1997; McCombs and Shaw 1972). Along with candidates and parties, the press has the ability to help define the nation's problems and identify possible solutions. While the press may sometimes echo the discussions of political elites, at other times it acts as a dissenting or alternative voice in the political arena.

The press has been performing these roles in the United States for the better part of two centuries. However, how the press performs these functions has changed dramatically. In the early to mid-1800s, the press was unabashedly partisan. Newspapers were viewed not as objective purveyors of information, but as sources of political propaganda. The avowed practice of today's press, in contrast, is to limit displays of political preferences to the editorial pages, while objectively presenting the news in the remainder of the paper.

The editorial influence on news coverage has electoral ramifications. In particular, the endorsement decisions of newspapers, reflected in the news coverage, may affect citizens' attitudes about competing candidates. Citizens may be unaware that the coverage in their daily newspapers is slanted, making them especially susceptible to persuasion (Milburn 1991). Because the modern press claims to be an objective source of information, unlike the partisan press of the past, any bias in the news section of today's newspapers is particularly insidious.

SEARCHING FOR ENDORSEMENT EFFECTS IN CAMPAIGN COVERAGE

We conduct an extensive content analysis of campaign coverage to see whether endorsement decisions affect news coverage. We then turn to individual-level survey data to determine whether citizens develop more favorable impressions of candidates who are endorsed.

We focus on U.S. Senate elections. Senate campaigns generate much more coverage in the local press. Senate races generate more coverage than House races because of the more efficient "media-market" fit in Senate contests (Clarke and Evans 1983; Goldenberg and Traugott 1984). Most metropolitan newspapers need to cover only one Senate race because all (or most) readers reside in the same state. However, most newspapers are read by voters residing in several House districts. In addition, House races receive less coverage than Senate campaigns because reporters and editors view House elections as less newsworthy (Cook 1989). Because Senate races generate so much media coverage, differences in press patterns in Senate campaigns may have a profound influence on voters' views of Senate candidates (Kahn and Kenney 1999). Examining Senate races is also preferable to an examination of presidential races because, in a given election year, more than 30 Senate races are available for study. However, to examine 30 presidential campaigns, we would need to go back to the nineteenth century. Of course, press coverage of presidential campaigns has changed dramatically over this extended period.

A CONTENT ANALYSIS OF CAMPAIGN COVERAGE

We examine all Senate races contested between 1988 and 1992—79 races involving incumbents and 17 open races.<sup>2</sup> To see whether newspaper endorsement decisions influenced press coverage in these races, we selected the largest circulating newspaper in each state for analysis, because this newspaper reaches more potential voters than any other paper in the state.<sup>3</sup> In 12 of the 79 incumbent races, the state's largest newspaper did not endorse a Senate candidate. These races were dropped from our sample, leaving 67 incumbent races available for analysis.<sup>4</sup> Newspapers endorsed a candidate in each of the 17 open campaigns.

For each newspaper in our sample, we examined news coverage between September 1 and Election Day.<sup>5</sup> We examined all articles that mentioned either candidate in the first, state, or editorial section of the newspaper. In total, we examined 5,529 articles.<sup>6</sup>

Considering Rival Explanations

To assess the impact of endorsement decisions on campaign coverage, it is necessary to take the political context into account. Endorsed candidates may receive more positive coverage because news personnel favor the candidates they endorse, showering the endorsed candidates with favorable press attention. On the other hand, endorsed candidates may receive more positive coverage because they happen to be superior in terms of experience, popularity, resources, and other criteria (Fenno 1996). We thus employ a series of indicators of the political context.

&lt;sup>3</sup> By concentrating on the larger and therefore more professional papers, we may be underrepresenting the relationship between editorial decisions and news content, the idea being that more professional papers are more likely to separate editorial opinions from news.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Because we are interested in examining whether endorsement decisions influence news content, we eliminate races in which an endorsement decision is not made. Although not making an endorsement may represent an endorsement decision, we cannot be certain. Some newspapers have a policy of not endorsing candidates. In our study, incumbents obtain the bulk of the newspaper endorsements (70%). Furthermore, our data suggest that endorsements of Senate candidates does not simply follow partisan lines. Newspapers endorse the Senate and the presidential candidate of the same party only 55% of the time

In all, 20 trained coders participated in the project. Intercoder reliability was assessed repeatedly during the coding process. On average, there was 92% agreement across all the content codes. More specifically, intercoder agreement was 0.90 for the tone of the article, 0.94 for the tone of the headline, 0.92 for the tone of the front page, 0.90 for attributed criticisms, 0.88 for unattributed criticisms, 0.92 for the tone of issue coverage, 0.90 for the tone of trait coverage, and 0.96 for the tone of horserace coverage. These measures of tone are discussed below.

Characteristics of the Candidates. To assess the quality of the candidates, we include several measures. First, we assess the seniority of the incumbent seeking election. Senior senators may be more successful in generating favorable coverage than their junior counterparts.<sup>7</sup> In addition to seniority, involvement in scandals and political controversies may influence press coverage of the sitting senators (Abramowitz 1988). Therefore, we include a measure assessing the candidates' involvement in a scandal.

We expect challengers with political "experience" and candidates who are more "skillfull" campaigners to capture more positive press coverage than their less experienced and less skillful counterparts. With regard to experience, others (Green and Krasno 1988; Squire 1989; Squire and Smith 1996) have developed measures that predict challengers' abilities to raise campaign funds and capture votes. Political experience should also explain whether challengers capture the attention of the press. Challengers with electoral and governing experience can rely on established relationships with reporters and editors. These candidates may also be more adept at generating news releases and holding news conferences.

Beyond experience, some challengers are skillful campaigners and are savvy at garnering the media's attention. As Squire and Smith (1996, 236-7) point out, "Campaign skills refer to the personal characteristics of a candidate that strengthen his or her appeal irrespective of party membership or stands on the issues." To measure the quality of the challenger, we combine the elective experience measure with the indicator of campaign skill.

Campaign Spending. Reporters and editors react to campaign activity when preparing stories (e.g., Clarke and Evans 1983). These activities include press releases by the candidates, press conferences, interviews with reporters, and campaign rallies. To stage these events, candidates need money (Cook 1989). Given the expected relationship between campaign spending and coverage, we control for incumbent and challenger spending when examining patterns of news treatment.

Closeness of the Races. The competitiveness of the campaign also influences news coverage. Candidates receive substantially more coverage when the race is perceived as competitive (e.g., Goldenberg and Traugott 1984; Kahn and Kenney 1999; Westlye 1991). In addition, as races become more "hard-fought," press coverage becomes more negative. In competitive races, newspapers publish more criticisms of the candidates and are more likely to use negative traits to describe the candidates. Given the strong relationship between competition and coverage, we control for the closeness of the race by relying on preelection polls published prior to October 1.

THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN ENDORSEMENTS AND COVERAGE

Reporters and editors can slant news coverage of campaigns in various ways-some subtle and difficult for casual readers to detect, others unambiguous and easily identified. We borrow liberally from Page's (1996) summary of more common techniques.

Tone of Coverage

We begin by looking at the relationship between endorsements and the overall tone of press coverage. Not all news stories are neutral in tone. Instead, the content of many campaign stories can be characterized as favorable toward one candidate and unflattering to another candidate. We scored each article as positive, negative, mixed, or neutral in tone and then calculated an average tone score for the articles written about each candidate.8

The ordinary least-squares (OLS) regression results in Table 1 indicate a link between the newspapers' endorsement and how reporters write about sitting senators. In the model for incumbents, the parameter estimate for endorsements is 0.24, with a standard error of 0.09. With all control variables held constant at their means, endorsed incumbents can expect an average tone score of 0.38 (on a scale ranging from -1 to 1), whereas unendorsed incumbents can expect an average tone score of 0.14. In contrast, challengers who secure endorsements do not receive more favorable press treatment than nonendorsed challengers, as indicated by the coefficient of only -0.01, with a standard error of 0.12, compared to nonendorsed challengers.

Among the control variables, competition influences the tone of coverage for incumbents; as races become more competitive, incumbents can expect more critical coverage.9 In the challenger model, as challengers become more experienced and more skillful, they receive more favorable coverage.

Tone of Prominent Coverage

We turn now to the tone of prominent press coverage. Many newspaper readers are attracted to stories because of the content of the headlines or the placement of stories. Front page stories, for instance, are much more likely to be read than articles buried near the back of the newspaper. Newspapers hoping to hurt or help candidates may slant the tone of headlines and the tone of front page stories. To examine the tone of prominent coverage, we calculate an average tone measure for the front page stories about a candidate and accompanied by our coding decisions.

Throughout this section, we include two additional control variables: a variable measuring each newspaper's endorsement of the presidential candidates in the two previous presidential elections and a variable measuring each newspaper's endorsement decision in the most recent Senate race. These variables failed to reach statistical significance in 15 of the 16 equations in Tables 1-4.

an average tone measure for the headlines about a candidate.

In Table 2A, we present incumbent and challenger models predicting the tone of front page articles, and in Table 2B, we present models predicting the tone of headlines for incumbents and challengers. The results indicate that endorsements influence the tone of coverage given to incumbents but not challengers. With all remaining variables fixed at their means, endorsed incumbents can expect an average tone score of 0.27 for all front page articles, compared to an average tone score of 0.06 for nonendorsed incumbents. The same pattern holds for headlines. The tone of headlines is more favorable for endorsed than for nonendorsed incumbents. Other factors being equal, the average tone of headlines for endorsed incumbents is 0.17 higher than the average tone of headlines for nonendorsed incumbents.

Beyond the endorsement effect, the closeness of the race influences the tone of prominent coverage for incumbents. As in the earlier analysis, the most important explanatory variable in the challenger models is the quality of the challenger, which influences the tone of front page articles and the tone of newspaper headlines.

Number of Criticisms

Newspapers can also slant coverage by explicitly criticizing canditates. Journalists often turn to quotations as a way of supporting their point of view. Furthermore, according to the professional norms of newswriting (Cappon 1991), reporters need to identify sources when they offer criticisms of candidates in news stories. However, they sometimes stray from this ideal, criticizing a candidate in a news story without citing a source. When criticisms are linked to sources, readers can employ well-known political cues (e.g., the party identification or ideological view of the source) to place the criticisms in political context. On the other hand, when reporters make critical comments about candidates without identifying a source, readers cannot depend on common heuristics to help "counterargue" the information.

Table 3 shows two sets of regression results for criticisms of incumbents and challengers. In Table 3A, we develop incumbent and challenger models to explain the number of attributed criticisms published about the candidates. In addition to controlling for the closeness of the race, the amount of spending by the candidates, and the characteristics of the candidates, we include the number of paragraphs written about the candidate during the course of the campaign. This is necessary because as the total coverage increases, so do criticisms.

The results in Table 3A indicate that endorsed incumbents are treated more favorably than Senators who fail to secure endorsements, receiving, on average, nearly 12 fewer attributed criticisms, holding all remaining variables constant. The endorsement decisions of newspapers do not affect coverage of challengers.

For the remaining variables in the model, the number of paragraphs written about the candidates is by far the most powerful factor influencing the number of attributed criticisms. The level of competition influences coverage in both models, with candidates in competitive races receiving more attributed criticisms. In addition, quality challengers who spend more money are successful in creating more attributed criticisms of incumbents.<sup>10</sup>

&lt;sup>10</sup> To examine more directly whether, by spending more money, challengers encourage the press to cover challengers' criticisms of the incumbents, we analyzed an OLS regression model of the number of criticisms of the incumbent by the challenger. The predictors in the model are the amount of spending by the challenger, incumbent spending, challenger quality, competition, seniority of the senator, the existence of scandal, and the newspaper's endorsement decision. As challengers' spending increases, the number of challenger criticisms of the incumbent increases significantly. The unstandardized coefficient for challenger spending is 34.8 (standard error = 16.8).

In Table 3B, we focus on unattributed criticisms. The dependent variable in these models is the number of unattributed criticisms published about the candidate divided by the total number of criticisms written about the candidate. Endorsements continue to influence the tone of coverage for incumbents, but endorsements fail to influence the coverage of challengers.<sup>11</sup>

Substance of Coverage

We now turn to the substance of coverage, seeking to determine whether coverage of issues, traits, or the horserace varies with endorsement decisions. We begin by examining issue coverage, which far outstrips trait and horserace coverage in terms of press attention. On average, 154 paragraphs about issues are published during Senate campaigns, wheres only 54 paragraphs, on average, discuss the personal characteristics of candidates, and 40 paragraphs, on average, discuss the candidates' chances of victory. 12

We calculate an average tone measure for stories mainly about issues.<sup>13</sup> The results presented in the first and second columns in Table 4 indicate that endorsed incumbents could expect more positive coverage of their policy views compared to nonendorsed incumbents. The endorsement coefficient indicates that the average tone score for issue articles is 0.23 higher for endorsed incumbents compared to nonendorsed incumbents, all other things being equal. In contrast, endorsements failed to influence the tone of issue coverage for challengers.

We also look at patterns of trait coverage. While professional standards for modern journalists caution against using evaluative adjective (Cappon 1991), contemporary news coverage is replete with evaluative adjectives (Page 1996). For example, reporters routinely characterize candidates as inexperienced, erratic, out of touch, or ineffective.

We present results for models of the proportion of negative trait coverage devoted to the candidates in the third and fourth columns in Table 4. In a deviation from the pattern we have seen thus far, endorsement decisions are not consequential for incumbents. Reporters are not more likely to describe incumbents in unflattering terms when the incumbent fails to impress the newspaper's editorial board. In addition, and consistent with our previous results, critical coverage of the challengers' personal traits does not vary with endorsement decisions.

Finally, we examine patterns of horserace coverage in the fifth and sixth columns in Table 4. Political reporters spend a great deal of time describing the viability of the competing candidates (e.g., Bartels 1988; Patterson 1993). The news discussion of the candidate's viability can be consequential, influencing voters' impressions of the candidates and affecting the candidates' abilities to raise funds (Bartels 1988; Mutz 1995). Endorsements do alter how reporters describe the viability of sitting senators. Incumbents who are not endorsed by newspapers are described as less electable than incumbents who are endorsed, all other things being equal. Reporters are less likely to use phrases such as "way ahead," "big lead," and "safe margin" when covering nonendorsed incumbents. Consistent with all previous analyses in this paper, endorsed challengers do not receive the same "endorsement slant" as incumbents.

The closeness of the race influences the coverage of issues, traits, and horserace for incumbents. Competition also alters the tone of horserace coverage given

Tone of trait coverage is the number of negative traits about a candidate/the total number of traits (positive and negative) mentioned about the candidate. The mean for incumbents was 0.27(SD=0.18) per race and 0.33(SD=0.20) for challengers. Tone of horserace coverage is the average viability score based on all the articles written about the candidate. to the challenger, <sup>14</sup> and the quality of the challenger influences the tone of issue coverage for challengers. <sup>15</sup>

In sum, our results suggest that newspaper endorsements shape newspaper coverage for incumbents. For every measure of coverage, save one, endorsed incumbents receive more favorable coverage than their nonendorsed counterparts. Coverage of challengers, on the other hand, is unaffected by endorsement decisions. Challengers do, however, reap indirect benefits from endorsements: When challengers capture endorsements, their opponents—the nonendorsed incumbents—receive more negative coverage. 16

the elected experience component of the challenger quality model is not a true interval measure. Therefore, we examined alternative operationalizations of challenger quality. First, we recoded the nine categories of experience into three binary variables. Second, we examined a binary experience variable (i.e., elected experience, no elected experience). These operationalizations of challenger quality did not perform as well as the original measure.

As discussed earlier, we replicated all the analyses in Tables 1–4 for open races. The endorsement variable fails to achieve statistical significance in these models. Nonetheless, as noted earlier, our conclusions about open races are only suggestive given the small number of cases.

&lt;sup>14</sup> Competition has been related to the slant of coverage in virtually all analyses. Given its consistent influence, it is possible that the strength of the relationship between the tone of coverage and endorsements changes as competition changes. We conducted two separate tests to investigate this possibility. First, we added an interaction between competition and endorsement to each of the analyses in Tables 1-4. The interaction coefficient fails to reach traditional levels of statistical significance (p < 0.05) in 14 of the 16 tests. Second, we partitioned competition into low, medium, and high levels and then reestimated all of the analyses in Tables 1-4 for each level. In highly competitive races, the endorsement variable reached statistical significance in eight of the 16 tests. In moderately competitive races, endorsement reached statistical significance in two of the 16 tests. And in races with low levels of competition, endorsement reached statistical significance in one of the 16 tests. These findings suggest a modest conditional relationship between competition and endorsement, with the impact of endorsement being the most powerful in the most competitive races. The results of these analyses, as well as other analyses discussed in this paper, are available from the authors upon request. <sup>15</sup> Although challenger quality has performed quite well, defeating the null hypothesis in four of the eight challenger models (p < 0.01),

The Slant of the News June 2002

ASSESSING TEMPORAL ORDER

We have argued that the views of newspaper editors influence how the paper covers Senate campaigns. However, it is conceivable that the causal direction is reversed. That is, what appears in the newspaper may influence the endorsement decisions of editors. However, prior research examining how endorsement decisions are made suggests that editorial boards do not simply rely on news reports (Clarke and Evans 1983; Seib 1994). In particular, endorsement decisions at virtually all newspapers come after detailed scrutiny by editorial board members of the competing Senatorial candidates, without the influence of reporters. Most editorial boards conduct face-to-face interviews with the Senatorial candidates, and reporters are not privy to these interviews. In addition, editorial boards routinely prepare detailed reports on potential candidates, intentionally excluding reporters. Nevertheless, to feel confident that endorsement decisions influence news coverage, and not vice versa, we conduct a test aimed directly at assessing temporal order. Our task is made easier because we know the precise publication date of each newspaper's endorsement.

We model coverage patterns over time and determine whether the endorsement decision of the newspaper alters the tone of coverage from early to late in the campaign. To assess the change in the tone of coverage before and after the endorsement decision, we specify and estimate a dynamic OLS model. Based on the date of each news article and the date of the endorsement decision, we develop a change model in which the tone of coverage after the endorsement decision is a function of (1) the tone of coverage before the endorsement decision, (2) the newspaper's endorsement decision, (3) changes in incumbent and challenger spending, and (4) changes in the closeness of the race. This enables us to estimate whether changes in the tone of coverage can be explained by the endorsement decision, controlling for prior coverage and other dynamic campaign forces.17

To measure the tone of coverage, we combine the eight measures of coverage presented in Tables 1–4 into a single global measure of tone. Thus, the global tone measure after the endorsement decision serves as the dependent variable. The results presented in Table 5 indicate that the endorsement decision changes the tone of coverage. Incumbents who capture the

As with the prior analyses, we control for the newspapers' prior endorsements. Consistent with our prior analyses, both measures of prior endorsements fail to reach statistical significance.
More specifically, we normalize each of the tone measures (e.g.,

Endorsement is a binary variable coded 1 if the incumbent is endorsed and 0 if the challenger is endorsed. Early coverage is the global tone score for coverage before the publication of the newspaper's endorsement. Changes in competition is the change in poll standings from polls published in late September to polls published in late October. Changes in incumbent and challenger spending (logged to base 10 and divided by the voting age population in the state) are changes in spending levels from early October (10/1–10/15) to late October through election day. newspaper's endorsement receive nearly a three-point increase in positive coverage after the editorial decision is published, on average, compared to incumbents who are not endorsed.<sup>21</sup>

These findings enhance our confidence that the editors' endorsement decisions are influencing the tone of news coverage. Still open, though, is the question of whether slanted coverage alters citizens' views of candidates. If slanted coverage falls on deaf ears, then the relationship between editorial opinion and news coverage is far less noteworthy.

all the variables from the original model as additional independent variables. Finally, we conduct classical tests of significance for the coefficient estimating the errors at time t-1. The results show that the standard error for the coefficient representing errors at time t-1 is almost as large as the coefficient, indicating the lack of autocorrelation in the model. Therefore, no remedial action is needed.

19 In this section, we restrict our examination to incumbent coverage because we found no evidence of an endorsement effect for challengers and candidates in open races.

&lt;sup>21</sup> We examined the temporal order question with one additional test. We compared the impact of the endorsement decision on the slant of coverage prior to and after the publication of the endorsement. We ran two OLS equations, one predicting the impact of the endorsement on global tone of coverage before the endorsement decision and the other predicting the impact of the endorsement on the global tone of coverage after the endorsement decision, controlling for all the variables in Tables 1–4. The impact of the endorsement decision on coverage increases sharply after newspapers print their endorsements. The unstandardized coefficient is 1.89 (standard error = 0.91) before the endorsement decision and 3.73 (standard error = 1.06) after the endorsement decision. This analysis suggests that once editors' preferences become known, the slant of new coverage in favor of endorsed candidates increases.

DO ENDORSEMENTS INFLUENCE CITIZENS' VIEWS OF CANDIDATES? A SURVEY ANALYSIS

People rely on and look to newspapers for information about political candidates (e.g., Goldenberg and Traugott 1984; Just et al. 1996). Therefore, it is reasonable to expect that slanted press coverage, driven by endorsement decisions, may influence the electoral fortunes of political candidates. To test for the electoral implications of newspaper endorsements, we integrate information about citizens' evaluations of the candidates with information about the newspapers' endorsement decisions, drawing on the 1988–92 National Election Studies/Senate Election Studies (NES/SES) for data on respondents' evaluations of U.S. Senate candidates.<sup>22</sup>

We create a measure of comparative candidate evaluations. We also control for rival factors known to influence evaluations, such as political attitudes, perceptions of national conditions, candidate characteristics, and campaign characteristics.<sup>23</sup>

Political Attitudes

We measure three political attitudes: party identification, ideological characteristics, and assessments of issues. According to Congressional scholars, these three forces consistently influence citizens' views of Senate candidates (e.g., Abramowitz and Segal 1992; Kahn and Kenney 1999). To measure party identification, we rely on the standard seven-point scale; for ideology, we construct a variable capturing the "comparative ideological distances" between the respondent and the two candidates, and we develop a measure of issue evaluations based on a series of spending questions included in the NES/SES.

Perceptions of National Conditions

Voters also consider the prevailing national conditions when casting their ballots (e.g., Ferejohn and Calvert 1984; Stein 1990), blaming candidates of the president's party if the national economy is getting worse or crediting candidates who share the president's partisan label if the economy seems healthy. Because voters may also use their vote for the president as a guide in their choice of Senate candidates (Campbell and Sumners 1990; Ferejohn and Calvert 1984), we include a measure of presidential vote choice in our model. In addition, voters may support the Senate candidate of the president's party if they approve of the president's job performance (Jacobson 2001; Kernell 1977), a possibility we examine.

Characteristics of the Candidates

We control for three characteristics of the candidates: the seniority of Senators, the quality of challengers, and whether incumbent Senators are considered controversial (Abramowitz 1988; Squire 1989). By including measures of candidate characteristics, we not only develop a more complete mdoel of citizens' evaluations, but also control for forces that covary with the newspaper's endorsement decision.

Campaign Spending

Citizens may develop more favorable impressions of challengers who spend more, compared to challengers who have few resources (e.g., Green and Krasno 1990; Jacobson 1980). In addition, levels of campaign spending, similar to candidates' characteristics, are likely to covary with the newspapers' endorsement decisions.

Competition

Finally, we measure the closeness of the race. Because editors may be more likely to endorse incumbents in lopsided races, it is necessary to control for competitiveness. Furthermore, people's impressions of candidates may vary with the closeness of race. For example, citizens may develop more favorable impressions of safe incumbents compared to vulnerable incumbents. Similarly, people may have more positive impressions of competitive challengers than challengers lagging far behind in the preelection polls.

THE IMPACT OF ENDORSEMENTS ON CITIZENS' VIEWS OF CANDIDATE

In Table 6, we examine the impact of slanted coverage, as conditioned by the amount of news attention devoted to the campaign. We employ a binary endorsement variable to capture the slant of coverage (1 = the incumbent is endorsed by the state's newspaper; 0 = the incumbent is not endorsed by the newspaper). By including the endorsement variable as a measure of slanted coverage, we capture the candidate preferences of the newspapers, thereby measuring the various ways endorsements influence the tone of coverage. We include an interaction term to estimate whether the impact of the newspaper's endorsement decision on candidate evaluations becomes more powerful as the amount of coverage increases.

The results in Table 6 indicate that the newspapers' endorsement decisions, by affecting patterns of press coverage, influence people's attitudes toward the candidates, holding all other factors constant.<sup>24</sup> As expected, the impact of the endorsement decision increases significantly with the amount of news attention, as indicated by the statistically significant and positive interaction coefficient.<sup>25</sup>

completed. <sup>23</sup> For information on the operationalization of these variables, see Appendix A.

 $<sup>^{24}</sup>$  We also examined whether the newspaper's endorsement decision, conditioned by the amount of coverage, influences the voting decision. In this analysis, the dependent variable is 1 = vote for the incumbent and 0 = vote for the challenger. The logit coefficient for the interaction between endorsement and the amount of coverage is 0.0005, with a standard error of 0.0002, suggesting that the slant

To illustrate these effects, we calculate point estimates on the comparative feeling thermometer. For example, when news coverage is at its observed maximum value (i.e., paragraphs = 3,070) and the incumbent is endorsed, the predicted score on the comparative feeling thermometers is 31.1, heavily in favor of the incumbent. However, when coverage is at the maximum value and the incumbent is not endorsed, the average score on the feeling thermometers drops more than 16 points, to 13.5, slightly in favor of the incumbent.

In contrast, the effect of endorsements on citizens' attitudes is virtually nonexistent given sparse coverage. With coverage at its observed minimum (i.e., of coverage, conditioned by the amount of coverage, significantly paragraphs = 71) and the incumbent endorsed, the predicted score on the comparative feeling thermometers is 30.4, heavily in favor of the incumbent. When the incumbent fails to secure the newspaper's endorsement and coverage is at the minimum, the predicted score decreases only to 29.8, still heavily favoring the incumbent. These examples demonstrate that the influence of slant of coverage depends on the amount of campaign news. The effect of endorsements increases as coverage increases, while the effects of endorsements are barely detectable when coverage is sparse.26

The control variables in Table 6 perform as expected. Virtually all of the rival explanations are signed in the hypothesized directions and reach statistical significance.

The amount of coverage notwithstanding, some people simply do not read the newspaper as often as others. Some people form a lifelong habit of reading the paper every day, while others pick up the newspaper far less frequently. People exposed to the slanted coverage on a daily basis, almost by definition, should be more influenced than people who pick up a paper less regularly.

To test this expectation, we established two categories of readers: everyday readers and less-thaneveryday readers. We then reestimated the equations in Table 6 for these two types of readers (see Table 7). The parameter estimate for the interaction term is statistically significant in the model for everyday readers but not in the model for people who read the paper less often. These findings indicate that the conditional relationship between slanted coverage and the amount of coverage is more powerful for people who read the paper every day. For citizens who do not read the newspaper daily, even large amounts of slanted coverage fail to influence their attitudes about the Senate candidates.

To illustrate the conditional relationship for everyday readers, we vary the amount of coverage and the endorsement decision.<sup>27</sup> When the incumbent is endorsed and the amount of coverage is at its peak (i.e., paragraphs = 3,070), the estimate for everyday readers is 17.1, favoring the incumbent. However, when the incumbent is not endorsed and the amount of coverage is at its highest point, the estimate for everyday readers is -4.9, favoring the challenger. In contrast, when information is at its lowest point, the estimate for everyday readers changes less than one point as a function of the endorsement decision. When coverage for the analysis is 2,623. We examined the impact of slanted coverage with an alternative measure: the global measure of tone based on the specific measures of slanted coverage presented in Tables 1-4. The influence of the global tone measure on candidate evaluations escalates as the total &lt;sup>26</sup> The impact of endorsements may be conditioned by other aspects of the campaign environment, such as competition. In particular, the impact of slanted coverage may be greater in competitive races where citizens are more interested in the race and are more likely to seek out news coverage. To test for this possibility, we reestimated the model in Table 6 and substituted the interaction term endorsement * competition for endorsement * total incumbent coverage. The interaction coefficient for endorsement * competition is 0.28, with a standard error of 0.11. The positively signed and statistically significant coefficient demonstrates that the influence of slanted coverage on citizens' evaluations of the candidates increases as competition increases.

27 We do not illustrate the conditional relationship between amount of coverage and endorsement decisions for less-than-everyday readers because the interaction coefficient and the baseline coefficients are not statistically significant for these respondents.

is scarce, incumbents are favored by about 16 points, regardless of the newspapers' endorsement decision.<sup>28</sup>

CONCLUSION

We have provided the most systematic evidence to date that newspaper coverage of campaigns is affected by editorial positions, which alter the tone of the news coverage given to incumbents. Moreover, endorsement-driven coverage affects the preferences of citizens. In races receiving a great deal of coverage, endorsed incumbents fare far better with potential voters than nonendorsed incumbents, even controlling for several forces known to shape the voting preferences of citizens. Individuals who routinely read their daily newspapers—the people who are most likely to vote—are most affected by coverage patterns.

We must emphasize that our study is limited to Senate campaigns over a six-year period. We encourage research on other races, different newspapers, and different years to assess the validity of our results.

Why do the newspapers' editorial decisions and news content coincide? We can only speculate.<sup>29</sup> The connection may be the result of the organizational structure of the newspaper (Gans 1980; Sparrow 1999). As Gans (1980, 97-8) explains, "Because news organizations are assembly lines on which people must work together to manufacture a product against a deadline, they almost always generate conformity—insofar as news judgment is filled with uncertainty, and top editors must, by virtue of their position, resolve uncertainty [by setting] tones and sometimes precedents, which then require conformity." Reporters tend not to be independent observers of the political scene. Instead, they are "employees of complex organizations who see their copy go through layers of editors" (Sparrow 1999, 107-8). Accordingly, it seems inevitable that the views of the editors will shape the content of the news. Ambitious reporters learn what to write to please their editors and publishers, who ultimately decide what is to be the news and which reporters are to be hired and promoted (Sparrow 1999). Page (1996) explains that reporters who hold the same political views as their editors and publishers may be more likely to be hired by particular newspapers and may be more likely to succeed at these newspapers. On the other hand, reporters with opposing views, if hired, may be less satisfied with their job and may be more likely to leave. Sparrow goes a step further by contending that reporters who write stories that "threaten the institutional interests" of the news organization feel "the invisible hand" of the news

room's social control. These reporters learn to regulate and censor themselves in order to be successful.

Finally, why do the editorial preferences of the newspaper influence news coverage only of sitting Senators? Senators, unlike challengers, are powerful figures whose position in government can promote or thwart the interests of editors. When editors view Senators as allies in terms of ideology or party, or even personally, they have clear incentives to foster a friendly and stable relationship with these Senators. If editors provide these Senators with favorable coverage, incumbents may be more likely to push policy agendas that resonate with the media elite. Furthermore, favorable press attention may encourage Senators to be friendly sources of information for reporters and editors as they write campaign and noncampaign stories.

"Unfriendly" Senators, in contrast, will not promote policy changes desired by the editors and publisher of the newspaper. Furthermore, Senators who are at odds with newspapers tend not to be cooperative with reporters and editors (Fenno 1996; Kahn and Kenney 1999). These uncooperative Senators may not hold as many press conferences, may not grant as many interviews, and may not be willing to offer comments on or "off the record."

Challengers, in contrast, are not the recipients of slanted coverage. This may be because they do not muster the same amount of coverage as incumbents (Goldenberg and Traugott 1984; Kahn and Kenney 1999; Westlye 1991). Challengers, perhaps because of their general lack of coverage, escape the slanted coverage due to editorial preferences.

Should we be concerned that news coverage has a political slant? In many other democratic countries, the press is unabashedly partisan. In Great Britain, for example, the major newspapers' partisan preferences are well known and these partisan preferences influence the tone and quantity of campaign coverage (see Semetko, Scammell, and Nossiter 1994). In the United States, in contrast, the press ostensibly strives for impartiality. The newspaper industry collectively assures Americans that news coverage is professionally produced and is free from bias. In fact, one of the "canons of journalism" of the American Society of Newspaper Editors is "a clear distinction between news reports and opinion" (McQuail 1992, 38). Our study shows that this goal has not been achieved.

The "hidden" bias in the United States press may be more problematic than the open bias of many European newspapers. If Americans believe that the news is presented in an objective fashion, free from editorial pressure, they may be more susceptible to media manipulation. Given that citizens rely on the press to bring them the news of campaigns, especially in races for statewide and national office, slanted coverage can have dramatic effects on the outcomes of elections.

APPENDIX A. CODING AND MEASUREMENT OF VARIABLES

Amount of News Attention: The number of paragraphs written about the candidates.

Attributed Criticisms: The number of attributed criticisms published about the canddate.

Campaign Spending: Spending for both candidates is logged to base 10 and divided by the state's voting age population. Campaign spending is measured early in the campaign (prior to October 1) to limit the chance that coverage patterns influence spending levels. The bulk of campaign coverage (73%) appears after September 30.

Coattail Voting: This variable is coded 1 (the respondent votes for a Republican for president and a Republican incumbent for Senate; the respondent votes for a Democrat for president and a Democratic incumbent for Senate) to -1 (the respondent votes for a Republican for president and a Democratic incumbent for Senate; the respondent votes for a Democrat for president and a Republican incumbent for Senate).

Comparative Feeling Thermometer: The arithmetic difference between the incumbent and the challenger scores on the NES feeling thermometer scales. Respondents who did not rate a candidate are placed at 50 on the feeling thermometer.

Competition: The difference in support of the candidates in preelection polls from 100, creating a scale ranging from 24 in the least competitive (100-76=24) to 100 in the most competitive race (100-0=100). Competition is measured early in the campaign (prior to October 1) to limit the chance that coverage patterns influence competition levels.

Controversial Senator: A Senator is controversial if (1) the Senator was involved in a well-publicized scandal, (2) the Senator ran unsuccessfully for president, (3) the Senator's advancing age was an important campaign issue, or (4) the Senator was newly appointed.

Economic Assessments: The wording of the sociotropic question is, "Now, thinking about the country as a whole, would you say that over the past year, the nation's economy has gotten better, stayed about the same, or gotten worse?" Economic assessments are measured on a five-point scale ranging from +2 (e.g., the nation's economy is much better and the incumbent is a Republican; the nation's economy is much worse and the incumbent is a Democrat) to -2 (e.g., the nation's economy is much better and the incumbent is a Democrat; the nation's economy is much worse and the incumbent is a Republican).

Endorsement Decision: The variable is coded 1 = end-orsed incumbent (nonendorsed challenger); 0 = endorsed challenger (nonendorsed incumbent).

Global Tone Measure: Each of the tone measures in Tables 1–4 is normalized and averaged.

Ideological Placement: The absolute distance between the respondents' self-placement on the ideological scale and their placement of the incumbent and the challenger is calculated. Then the respondents' distance from the challenger is subtracted from their distance from the incumbent, indicating which candidate the respondents feel closer to ideologically. Respondents not answering the ideological questions are recoded to the middle of the scale.

Issue Evaluations: The issue scale is based on respondents' spending preferences for six federal programs (i.e., the environment, education, welfare, health care, child care, and defense). The candidates' positions on these six issues is estimated by calculating a mean position for all Democratic candidates and a mean position for all Republican candidates, based on descriptions of the candidates' positions in the press. The respondents' position is matched with the candidates' positions on each of the issues. The scale is then recoded so that respondents who hold positions identical to those of the incumbent are given the highest score, and respondents sharing all the same positions as the challenger are given the lowest score. We adopt this measure because the NES/SES does not ask respondents to place candidates on issue scales.

Newspaper Readership: The NES/SES asks respondents, "How many days in the past week did you read a daily newspaper?"

Quality of Challenger: This measure is based on the challenger's experience and the challenger's campaign skills. Challenger experience is based on a nine-point scale: 9 = sitting governor, 8 = House members and statewide officials serving more than one term, 7 = first-term House members and first-term statewide officials, 6 = mayors of major cities, 5 = state legislative leaders, 4 = state legislators, 3 = other local office holders, 2 = celebrities, and 1 = noncelebrities. The candidates' campaign skills are based on descriptions in the CQ Weekly Report and the Almanac of American Politics. Candidates described as skillful campaigners are scored 3, candidates with a mixture of positive and negative reports are scored 2, and candidates described as poor campaigners receive a score of 1. The experience measure is multiplied by the skill measure to create the measure of challenger quality.

Party Identification: Respondents strongly identifying with the incumbent's party receive the highest score (+3); respondents strongly identifying with the challenger's party are given the lowest score (-3).

are given the lowest score (-3).

Presidential Approval: This scale ranges from +2 (e.g., the Senator is a Republican and the respondent strongly approves of the Republican president's performance, the Senator is a Democrat and the respondent strongly disapproves of the Republican president's performance) to -2 (e.g., the Senator is a Republican and the respondent strongly disapproves of the Republican president's performance, the Senator is a Democrat and the respondent strongly approves of the Republican president's performance).

Seniority: Years in office.

Tone of Articles/Tone of Front Page Articles/Tone of Issue Articles: Negative articles receive a score of -1, positive articles receive a score of +1, and neutral and mixed articles receive a score of 0.

Tone of Headlines: Negative headlines receive a score of -1, positive headlines receive a score of +1, and neutral and mixed headlines receive a score of 0.

Tone of Horserace Coverage: Press assessments are rated on the following scale: 5 = sure winner, 4 = likely winner, 3 = competitive, 2 = likely loser, and 1 = sure loser.

Tone of Trait Coverage: The number of paragraphs describing the candidates' personalities negatively is divided by the total number of trait paragraphs. A variety of negative traits is examined, including dishonest, uninformed, inexperienced, ineffective, part of the Washington establishment, erratic, insensitive, weak leader, and not an independent thinker.

Unattributed Criticisms: The number of unattributed criticisms is divided by the total number of criticisms published about the candidate.

APPENDIX B. CODING OF NEWSPAPER ARTICLES

Listed below are illustrative examples of how we coded news content from three races: Wallop vs. Vinich, 1988, Casper Star Tribune; Helms vs. Gantt, 1990, The Raleigh News and Observer; and Daschle vs. Haar, 1992; Argus Leader (Sioux Falls).

Tone of Coverage

1. "The Wyoming and National Education Associations endorsed Democratic Senate nominee John Vinich Monday with the NEA giving him $5,000 for his campaign against twotime incumbent Sen. Malcolm Wallop." Casper Star Tribune, 9/20/88 (positive for Vinich, neutral for Wallop).

2. "[Harvey B. Gantt] said during a campaign swing through the Triangle that Mr. Helms had spent his 18 years in the U.S. Senate trying to stomp out such 'personal demons' as communists, liberals, and artists rather than worrying about issues that matter to North Carolina families." The News and Observer, 9/23/90 (negative for Helms, neutral for Gantt).

Tone of Headlines

- 1. "Wallop accused of 'Grandstanding." Casper Star Tribune, 9/11/88 (negative for Wallop).
- 2. "Helms urges support for Bush stand." The News and Observer, 9/6/90 (neutral for Helms).

Attributed Criticism

1. "At a Union-sponsored barbeque at North Casper Park, Democrats Bryan, Sharratt, and John Vinich said in interviews that their opponents—U.S. Rep. Dick Chaney and U.S. Sen. Malcolm Wallop—have systematically failed to address the problems of Wyoming's working people." Casper Star Tribune, 9/6/88 (attributed criticism of Wallop).

2. "The Republican candidate for the U.S. Senate repeatedly has attacked Democratic incumbent Tom Daschle for breaking his word on the anti-tax pledge." Argus Leader, 10/18/92 (attributed criticism of Daschle).

Unattributed Criticism

- 1. "Vinich was obviously nervous and fatigued at the beginning of the debate." Casper Star Tribune, 10/28/88 (unattributed criticism of Vinich).
- 2. "After insensitively criticizing a TV ad for Democratic Sen. Tom Daschle, her main election opponent, Haar found herself in the spotlight." Argus Leader, 10/13/92 (unattributed criticism of Haar).

Tone of Issue Coverage

- 1. "Mr. Gantt says he is willing to consider a tax increase to finance necessary services, but he makes little effort to define how he would tax—what taxes he would choose or not choose." The News and Observer, 9/28/90 (negative for Gantt).
- 2. "South Dakota Sen. Tom Daschle says he would lobby a new Clinton administration to rewrite the nation's farm program... Daschle, a Democrat who is running for reelection, wants to boost prices for wheat and other crops by raising government loan rates." Argus Leader, 10/28/92 (neutral for Daschle).

Positive Trait

"Quayle also endorsed his friend Sen. Malcolm Wallop calling him a man of 'keen intellect...." Casper Star Tribune, 9/20/88 (positive trait for Wallop).

Negative Trait

"Mal Hinchley of Pierre, a chemical dependency counselor who served with the Navy Seabees in Thailand, said Haar's comments showed a lack of compassion." Argus Leader, 10/10/92 (negative trait for Haar).

Horserace

1. "Democratic challenger John Vinich has drawn to within 10 points of incumbent Republican Sen. Malcolm Wallop, according to a Democratic Party poll..." Casper Star Tribune, 9/10/88 (competitive for Vinich, competitive for Wallop).

2. "Sen. Tom Daschle, a Democrat, leads Republican challenger Charlene Haar 56 percent to 33 percent, with 11 percent undecided." Argus Leader, 10/12/92 (sure winner for Daschle, sure loser for Haar).

BOOK REVIEWS

Political Theory

Civil Society, Constitution, and Legitimacy. By Andrew Arato. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 2000. 352p. $72.00 cloth, $26.95 paper.

Andreas Kalyvas, University of Michigan

Recent years have witnessed momentous political transformations across the globe. From Eastern and Central Europe and the former Soviet Union to South Africa, these changes are often described as transitions from state bureaucracies, party dictatorships, and authoritarian rule to liberal constitutional democracies and market economies. Andrew Arato, moving gracefully among the fields of political theory, sociology, history, constitutionalism, and comparative politics, redirects our attention to the originary moment of constitutional creation, when ordinary lawmaking recedes in favor of extraordinary politics and higher lawmaking. It is also a moment when fundamental constitutional norms emerge as the main point of contest within political debate and action. Combining empirical and descriptive analysis with normative considerations, Arato persuasively demonstrates how the mode of creation of new constitutions affects the democratic and institutional content of these transformations as well as the prospects for future consolidation of the newly developed constitutional norms.

By focusing mainly, but not exclusively, on the various forms of constitution-making in Eastern and Central Europe during the early 1990s, Arato not only proposes an original and comprehensive theory of comparative constitutional politics, but also revisits the old dichotomy of revolution and reform that has bifurcated modern politics between the rebellious desire for an absolute break with the past and the piecemeal introduction of gradual changes through already established legal mechanisms. Thus, while he acknowledges the democratic appeal of total revolutionary transformations invoked by theories of extralegal popular constituent power, such as those of Emmanuel Sieyès and Carl Schmitt, he follows Hannah Arendt in denouncing the juridical vacuum caused by absolute legal ruptures. Revolutions, he warns, divest individuals of their legal protections and rights, endangering their security and freedoms. At the same time, however, Arato recognizes that continuity with the past suffers from a democratic deficit and from considerable legitimation problems. Whereas such continuity avoids the perils of violence, permanent dictatorship, and illegality, it often preserves elements from previous authoritarian regimes.

To avoid the hackneyed polarization between revolution and reform, Arato opts for a different alternative for achieving genuine political change. Interestingly enough, given his previous writings, he does not relocate the power of making constitutions in civil society as, for example, Ulrich Preuss does. As he convincingly argues, such an approach poses more problems than it can solve. Because civil society is composed of a plurality of voluntary associations, it can hardly function as the unitary subject of the constituent power. Moreover, these groups not only lack the electoral support that could enable them to play a genuinely representative role. but also manifest significant inequalities of resources. Finally, although Arato does not explicitly mention it, the notion of a constituent civil society entails a dangerous overpoliticization of society by blurring of the crucial distinction between the political and the social. In a similar vein, Arato rejects the parliamentary road to constitution-making through established amendment procedures by pointing to the logical inconsistencies and political dilemmas that ultimately obliterate the crucial difference between ordinary and higher lawmaking. He also dismisses the more traditional method of constituent assemblies, like that of the French National Assembly of 1789, because of the potential for dictatorial powers, excessive majoritarianism, voluntaristic fantasies, and procedural perplexities, which historically have led to permanent instability, civil wars, and restoration.

In contrast to these flawed models of constitutional politics, Arato, by engaging in a critical but fruitful dialogue with Bruce Ackerman, proposes an innovative theory of dual constitutional origins: He places radical political change in the context of legal continuity. Although the concept of legal continuity could be misinterpreted as just another version of parliamentary constitution-making that Arato has repudiated, in fact it represents one of his most remarkable contributions to the theory of constitutional politics. The call for legal continuity consists of two complementary normative arguments, which are derived largely from the recent political and legal experience in the Hungarian transition. On the one hand, the founding of new legal and political orders should always take place within the framework of the rule of law. On the other hand, it is obvious that in the cases of Eastern and Central Europe, the rule of law did not exist prior to the collapse of state Communism. For this reason Arato conceives of legal continuity as a necessary fiction. The framers should act as if they were operating under the rule of law even if they are not and should treat the inherited constitution as if it were actually a valid basic law of the land although it is not. However, as Arato explains, the appeal to a fictional continuity functions in reality as a break with the illegality of the previous regimes; a strategy of explicit constitutional rupture, in contrast, would represent a continuity with the lawless practices of the past.

It is on this point that Arato's approach runs into problems. He is at pains to find an institutional analogue for the notion of fictional continuity. After rejecting parliamentary transitions and having conceded that the American founding experience is unique and therefore nonreplicable, he is left with only one option: the method of roundtable negotiated transitions. Although he is attracted by the ability of roundtables to be self-limiting, to respect legality, and to institute a modern system of rights, he admits that historically they have taken an undemocratic path to democracy insofar as they are composed of self-appointed elites who negotiate and bargain in secrecy. This explains why he opposes Preuss's move to endow them with the originary power to make constitutions. To rectify these shortcomings, which point to the normative deficit of negotiated transitions, Arato introduces the principles of openess, publicity, deliberation, consensus, and reflexivity. But it remains unclear by which mechanisms the free and open discussion within the public sphere and the deliberations within the roundtables would actually influence one another. If by these five principles he means that the constitutional decisions adopted by the roundtables must be ratified by a popular referendum of an informed and engaged citizenry, I do not see how he can avoid implicitly endowing these instances with constituent powers. This uncertainty regarding how constitution-making would be conducted and by whom reflects a deeper ambiguity in Arato's work toward the notion of the constituent power itself. It is not clear whether he is rejecting it altogether or simply wishes to decenter and dedramatize it so as to allow for a more differentiated and pluralist formulation, which is also free from any voluntaristic and extralegal connotations.

Notwithstanding these doubts, Arato offers one of the most original theories of constitution-making to date. Comprehensive in its range, interdisciplinary in its ambitions, erudite, and challenging, it marks a turning point in the study of democratic transitions that will surely influence future discussions of democratic constitutionalism.

Friends and Citizens: Essays in Honor of Wilson Carey McWilliams. Edited by Peter Dennis Bathory and Nancy L. Schwartz. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2000. 311p. $50.00.

Philip Abbott, Wayne State University

Wilson Carey McWilliams is certainly one of the great teachers of American political thought in his generation. The Idea of Fraternity in America (1973), as well as his series on presidential elections and many essays, has captivated both his students and his colleagues. There are, of course, many prominent figures who have addressed the complexity of political thought in America in recent years but few whose influence is acknowledged so centrally on these terms. Of course, it is sometimes difficult for those influenced by a master teacher to convey thoughts once they are removed from the electricity of the seminar or conference. McWilliams is a good example of this phenomenon. At one level his understanding of American political culture is Whitmanesque. McWilliams is not primarily a jeremiadic thinker and much of his writing has the same breezy celebration of America as Whitman's. Added to this perspective is an intense appreciation of Mark Twain's comedic iconoclasm. Both foci are juxtaposed with what is his central preoccupation, a deep attachment to the Puritan vision of the human experience. McWilliams generalized the latter in The Idea of Fraternity in America as a tradition of fraternal politics that was enriched by other European immigrants. Although "Puritanism... was here first," (113) it was superceded, though not replaced, by the powerful symbols of "Enlightenment liberalism." McWilliams' model of cultural dualism offered the first systematic critique of Hartz's liberal society thesis and has since been replicated and expanded by many others including Robert Bellah and Rogers M. Smith. In fact, there is some irony in his alternative to Hartz's singlefactor explanation of American culture, since it returned the study of American political thought to the traditional dualist perspectives developed by Progressive scholars, who are villains in McWilliams' own reading of American political thought. Moreover, McWilliams' focus on Puritan conceptions of community has led him to an attachment to premodern conceptions of politics as well as to a decided antipathy toward the political world of the American founders.

How does this mixture of Aristotle, Calvin, Winthrop, the antifederalists, Twain, and Whitman cohere? An unsympathetic reader might conclude that McWilliams' America is a space occupied more by himself than the political culture he studies. The essays in this festschrift are directed toward explaining this unique perspective. The only essay that directly attempts to answer the question above is Mac McCorkle and David E. Price's fine effort. A powerful vision offered by a teacher can create a hermetic scholarly community. McCorkle and Price offer a corrective by showing how McWilliams' thought can be connected to the liberal/communitarian debate that The Idea of Fraternity in America actually prefigured. Though they admit that McWilliams' political thought is composed of "dazzling eccentricities," they identify him as a religious communitarian who rejects both a "faddish existentialist notion of community" and a "romantic Gemeinschaft dream." While Michael Sandel identifies the problem of modern democratic regimes as resting upon an "unencumbered self," the authors conclude, "Although writing from Massachusetts Bay, the Harvard professor chooses to bypass Winthrop and his 'Model of Christian Charity,' all successor Puritan divines, as well as the rest of Puritan thought and culture. Democracy's Discontent, moreover, has no Great Awakenings, one passing mention of evangelical abolitionism, no Social Gospel, no Reinhold Niebuhr, and only one reference to Martin Luther King, Jr., as a preacher" (p. 242). William Galston is ostensibly more sympathetic in his Liberal Purposes but the contribution of religion to his conception of community is one of accommodation and management of a stolid "traditional morality" that is "monolithically conservative" (p. 246). McCorkle and Price recommend that Sandel and Galston attempt to incorporate covenant theory into their accounts and that McWilliams engage in "constructive family deliberations" with the secular communitarians.

It is no accident that five of the essays in this volume focus directly upon friendship. Though McWilliams has focused upon fraternity as the key to the submerged tradition in American political thought, he has been uncomfortable with its association with the modern revolutionary project. The Aristotelian conception of friendship is what he really means to uncover and enhance. The theoretical problem with this perspective, of course, is not only finding a space for this kind of friendship in a liberal society but also accommodating the Aristotelian conception to the practicalities of a democratic demos. Patrick Dennen imaginatively explores these issues in his "Friendship and Politics: Ancient and Modern." In the process, he discovers two little-remembered Progressive reformers, H. C. Merwin and Mary Kingsbury Simkhovitch, who tempered their commitment to political rationality with a sympathy for the real world of average working men and women. So too does Bob Pepperman Taylor find Aristotelian sensibilities in versions of Progressivism. Taylor presents a well-deserved reevaluation of Jane Addams as a much more complex thinker with regard to democratic citizenship than both the "Saint Jane" interpreters and the revisionists. Jean W. Yarbrough reviews the Jefferson-Adams correspondence and finds an exemplary case of friendship in a liberal republic that "leaves space for noble souls to pursue equal, if not more important private interests" but does not promote philosophy at the expense of politics and political life (p. 77). If the Jefferson-Adams friendship, late blooming as it was, modified the political excesses of both figures, the friendship between Andrew Jackson and Martin Van Buren, according to Marc Landy, also had beneficial consequences for the republic.

The most profound essay in this grouping is Norman Jacobson's short, eloquent response to Thoreau's discussion of friendship in "A Week on the Concord and Merrimac Rivers." Jacobson titles his essay "'Damn Your Eyes!' Thoreau on (Male) Friendship in America" and he argues that Thoreau judged friendship to be impossible in a society that conceived of all relationships in terms of contract and utility and was "bold enough to hold himself up for scrutiny as an example of one crushed by such circumstances" (p. 123). This is also the only essay that considers the submerged gendered implications of friendship and Thoreau's exposure is an important commentary on masculine identity in America.

Other essays include a treatment of the hero in American political culture by Gerald Pomper that offers a theoretically provocative typology; a brief treatment by Harvey Mansfield of Aristotle and Tocqueville animated by deeply skeptical vision of democratic practice; an analysis of the Creation by Thomas Prangle, which, interestingly, is the only essay devoted fully to a religious subject; a case study of neighborhood activism in Philadelphia by Edward A. Schwartz;

a study of Lincoln as (re)founder by Joseph Romance; and an attempt to apply Aristotelian conceptions of citizenship to modern conditions by Dennis Hale. Two effective essays (one by Tracy Strong on Rousseau and Tocqueville and one by Sidney Milkis on political parties in America) actually seem to be arguing directly against McWilliams' teaching.

Friends and Citizens is a model festschrift. Particularly recommended are the cluster of essays on friendships and politics. Though it cannot be said successfully to bring order to the "dazzling eccentricities" of Wilson and Carey McWilliams' teachings, it does illustrate their capacity to stimulate.

Rereading Power and Freedom in J. S. Mill. By Bruce Baum. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2000. 360p. $65.00 cloth, $24.95 paper.

Ronald J. Terchek, University of Maryland at College Park

This is a rich and rewarding book, weaving familiar themes in the literature on John Stuart Mill into a discussion of Mill's conception of power. Bruce Baum convincingly shows that Mill's liberalism requires more than toleration and individualism and invites a broader understanding of liberalism, one which goes beyond noninterference, rights, and neutral procedures. Meaning to show the "emancipatory possibilities of liberal political theory," the author argues that Isaiah Berlin, John Rawls, and Robert Nozick focus too narrowly on negative freedom and do not sufficiently probe how power and freedom are related (p. 15). In contrast, Baum's liberalism aims at the self-development and self-governance of each member of a liberal society.

This book is meant to "challenge the common view that there is an inverse relationship between power and freedom" as well as the idea "that the more society leaves people alone—free from external interference—the greater is their freedom" (p. 5). Baum sees his work as offering an argument for "the emancipatory possibilities in the liberal tradition" that pays attention to "the positive side of freedom," something that he associates with autonomy and that requires enabling conditions (as well as the elimination of disabling constraints). Thus, someone who "lacks powers of self-determination" is not free (p. 6). In this early formulation, Baum offers us a concept that is general and broad; in later chapters, he sets out to give us concrete instances where some lack "powers of self-development."

As Baum's vehicle to unfold this generous liberalism, Mill is said to seek the autonomy of everyone and appreciate how freedom and power are inexorably tied together. We are taken through Mill's examination of the psychological processes that enlarge or contract our capacities for self-development by shaping our desires, beliefs, and identity. These processes are then linked to political and social relationships that nurture or stifle these capacities. For all of his admiration of Mill, Baum recognizes several weaknesses and draws on participatory democratic theory, feminist critiques, and other contemporary theories to fill in the blanks that Mill is said to have ignored.

The author shows the many ways that Mill ties power to autonomy. We find chapters, for example, on gender, economy, and democratic politics in which Baum details how Mill sees asymmetrical power relations diminishing the freedom of many. Mill is not content to rely on or malism or proceduralism to promote and protect freedom. Power has to do with the opportunities as well as obstacles that individuals face when they chose a plan of life and seek to implement it.

However, Baum's parts turn out to be richer than the whole. Take his chapters on public opinion and on Millian economics, for example. In the former, Baum does an admirable job showing how influential Mill takes public opinion to be and how it can stunt moral development. In the chapter on economics, we find a Mill who seeks maximum economic freedom, meaning "considerable equality with respect to educational and occupational opportunities, income, and property holdings" in which people have a share in the governance of firms. The government's role is to tax (including inheritances), regulate property, educate, and provide poor relief. But from Mill's perspective, all of these economic reforms cannot adequately lead to self-development, or what Baum calls freedom as autonomy, and the reason has to do with the force of public opinion. Baum fails to appreciate in this chapter what he nicely developed earlier—that public opinion as currently constituted is the major obstacle to autonomy. If all of the other emancipatory moves that Baum believes Mill supports were to come to fruition but public opinion remained fixed, then the homogeneity, dullness, and commercialism that Mill detects in liberal society would stifle self-development.

Why should this be so? On Mill's account, a new orthodoxy has replaced the old order, penetrating all sectors of modern life and displacing strong, viable alternatives that might challenge it. The new orthodoxy is commercialism, promising money and mobility as a means to success and ultimately to happiness. However much people give verbal approval to noncommercial standards, Mill believes that their commitments are to making and spending money. Even education is judged by its commercial utility, not by its capacity to build a liberally educated person or promote a critical spirit.

Baum does not spend much time with the Mill who is concerned with how freedom and newly—won power can turn against its beneficiaries. We see this in Mill's critique of public opinion and education, topics about which Baum devotes considerable time but does not push his argument for enough. The problem for Mill is not primarily about curriculum but about the ways the commercial mentality has invaded society, including its schools. For Mill, life is spent learning and the primary teacher is society, instructing people in what is valued and what is not. Mill laments that schools reinforce rather than challenge commercial norms; the lessons learned are about the primacy of production and economics.

Here and at various other places in the book, Baum fails to see that Millian freedom comes with struggle, and it is a struggle not only with those who use their power to dominate but also with ourselves when we succumb too readily to public opinion, especially with respect to commercial norms. Mill's challenge comes not in his particular policy recommendations but in the questions he asks and the issues he raises. He asks us, as Baum clearly demonstrates, to explore how economic inequality can subvert political equality, how domination becomes acceptable through constant use, how the various expressions of power penetrate liberal society, and how we often unreflectively accept the situation in which we find ourselves. Baum's considerable contribution comes with his careful demonstration that a generous liberalism needs to focus on power in its many guises and how it enables or disables the freedom of men and women.

The Enchantment of Modern Life: Attachments, Crossings, and Ethics. By Jane Bennett. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2001. 213p. $55.00 cloth, $17.95 paper.

Kennan Ferguson, University of South Florida

At first, it may seem that Jane Bennett is attacking Max Weber. Against his famous assertion that modernity has disenchanted the world, rendering it potentially understandable and thus devoid of the power of transcendent meaning, Bennett engages in a traditionally theoretical explication and critique. She traces those thinkers who arise from this tradition, whether or not acknowledged, and addresses (and celebrates) those whose philosophies of the modern world provide alternative readings, most notably Kant and Deleuze.

But it is quickly apparent that Bennett's goal is much more demanding and rewarding than to summarize and critique. Instead, the purpose of this spirited and absorbing book is to call attention to those sites of contemporary experience that, far from being anesthetizing, continue to make experience meaningful. Indeed, it points to those aspects of contemporary existence that have the potential to reenchant, to recapture meaning from meaninglessness.

Bennett notes what few Weberians are willing to admit: The rationalism that he alleges is overtaking modernity actually conjoins everywhere with inventiveness, playfulness, and excitement. Human lives, far from always being dour, overdetermined existences, are frequently lived in wonder and marvel. The trick, therefore, lies in discovering the sources of this enchantment and encouraging its recognition and continuation.

This creative theorization arises from diverse and eclectic sources. From classic philosophy, Bennett finds the Epicurean notion of the "swerve," the conception that all matter has an intrinsic motility and unpredictability, the most inspiring to contemporary students of politics. From Kant, she takes the recognition that the supersensible world imposes itself upon our purported understanding of nature. And from animals' learning to speak, to Wim Wenders's films, to Deleuze and Guattari's "body without organs," she draws out the exotic and transformative roles that our attachments to the nonhuman can play.

Perhaps most tellingly, Bennett uses Kafka to ambush her reader from odd hiding places and in surprising disguises. This is not simply the Kafka who denounces the hyperbureaucratized, modern life, though; Bennett's attention goes instead to the combinations of the animal and the human, the rational and the absurd, the stultifying and the exhilarating that Kafka introduces to literature. Kafka's characters, who transform from Homo sapiens to beast (and vice versa), who ride in strangely animate and politicized objects, and who are entranced by the agencies that entrap them, are the avowed inspiration for Bennett's political vision.

Bennett clearly has an implicit narrative of disenchantment herself here, but it is not the disenchantment of the world as much as it is the disenchantment of those of us who attempt to make sense of the world. Those theorists who depict an impotent humanity in the vise of the modern world, those social scientists who want to hew as close as possible to "science" yet insist on the most sterile, impoverished versions of it, and those who rigorously police the boundaries among ethics, politics, and aesthetics (guarding each from the contamination of the others): These are the nihilistic forces that actually disempower political will and discourage receptivity to difference and inspiration.

At the center of the book stands a chapter dedicated to explaining a materialism that springs, Phoenix-like, from the ashes of Marxist rationality. For Marx and his followers, the fetishization of commodities subtracts attention from the work that has produced them and, thus, ultimately subtracts meaning from humanity. Conversely, Bennett celebrates the ability of commodities, even mass-produced consumer commodities, to transfix and transform us, adding significance and import to human existence. Though this celebration has its dangers, she argues, the reductionisms that view commodities as no more or less than the circumstances of their manufacture (or the institutionalized economies of their exchange) loom far more ominous, for they disparage the bodily, historical, sonorous, emotive, and intellectual engagements that these commodities provide.

Perhaps the highest compliment one can pay to a book (and one that can all too rarely be paid to books in political science) is to say that it transforms the reader's outlook and behavior. For me, Bennett's book awakened what Thoreau (the subject of her 1994 book) also does in his writing: the recognition of how convention and routine are the enemies of creation and engagement. It is customary, toward the end of a book review, to articulate an objection to some aspect of the work. Not only do the strengths of Bennett's book far outweigh any weaknesses, but also, more significantly, the very inspiration that it provides challenges the rote following of normative practices. To tack on an admonishment, even an apophantic one, would be to privilege ritual over innovation. This is a groundbreaking book, encompassing a theoretical commingling of diverse techniques of thought from Lucretius to the inventors of nanotechnology, a profound challenge to traditional critiques of modernity and materialism, and an embrace of the contingent and the marvelous. Bennett not only shows us the way to an enchanted world, she shows us that we are already there.

Politics Out of History. By Wendy Brown. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2001. 193p. $45.00 cloth, $14.95 paper.

Leslie Paul Thiele, University of Florida

Wendy Brown argues that the metanarratives of modernity stories of the historical march of reason, the rule of truth, the fruits of expanding freedom, the benevolence of growing equality, and the prospect of endless peace and progress have been undermined by the experiences of our times. These narratives once provided banisters for political thought and staircases for political life. They are now left in tatters, and there are no viable replacements. Politics Out of History explores the deformities of politics in these times. Despite the heralded triumph of liberal capitalism, the world does not appear to be blessed with an overabundance of stable, just, pluralistic societies in which poverty, environmental degradation, and social cleavages are but faint memories. Confronted with enduring problems and denied consoling ideals, denizens of the postmodernity are left to their own devices. They must negotiate a world where power is without logic, political life is deprived of teleology, nature has become contested terrain, and conviction often appears as a retreat to the indefensible.

For Brown, the theorist is a diagnostician. The chief symptom of decaying life in the wake of the battered narratives of modernity, at least among the liberal left, is moralism. Understood as a self-righteous reproach to (all cohabitations with) power coupled with an unproductive whining about past injuries, moralism is a reactionary gesture. It is the naysaying of (political) life that accompanies the historical loss of teleological support for our ethical impulses. Moralism, Brown asserts, is antidemocratic in that its reproachful attitude deprecates open debate. (There is an intriguing analysis of Brown's own encounter with feminist moralizing, where her critical approach to the status of a women's studies program elicited accusations of collaborating with the enemy.) To the extent that moralism promotes an uncompromising politics of truth, Brown (like Hannah Arendt) condemns it as totalitarian.

In lieu of a retreat to moralism, Brown promotes an agonistic politics that embraces contingency, invention, and compromise. Her theoretical comrades-in-arms in this venture are Friedrich Nietzsche and Michel Foucault, and their influence is everywhere. Brown is a superb reader of Nietzsche and Foucault. In these essays, she seldom strays from their shadows. Brown's chapter on Marx is more original, as she assesses Marx's tendency both to dismiss and to rely heavily upon the power of superstructure and culture. (Of course, Lenin already pointed out that ideology was vested with power.) Although the essay bears a noticeable Foucaultian slant, Brown criticizes Foucault's geneaology for "sharing some of the same conceits about power's inherently logical yet hidden operation discerned in Marx" (p. 90). Unfortunately, Brown does not defend this claim. And in a subsequent chapter, she appears to contradict it, eulogizing Foucaultian geneology precisely for its rejection of all continuous histories and its assertion that power does not demonstrate a clear logic (p. 117) but rather develops into "varied and protean orders of subjection" (p. 104). One is left unsure of the status of the former criticism.

Brown believes that the pursuit of practicality hinders intellectual life, at least for the theorist. Hence Politics Out of History offers little in the way of prescription. Yet we may glean a constructive, and hopeful, message from Brown's subtle readings of Marx, Nietzsche, Freud, Benjamin, Foucault, and Derrida. It is a message quite similar to that provided by Hannah Arendt, though Brown largely ignores this linkage. For Arendt, the exercise of judgment allows us to win back our human dignity from what she called the "pseudo-divinity named History." By denying history's prerogative to define our lives and world without denying its importance, Arendt hoped to resuscitate our capacity for judgment and, through judging, to validate the particular and the contingent. (The Life of the Mind (1978) and Lectures on Kant's Political Philosophy (1982)). Brown suggests that the one-dimensional metanarratives of modernity, however seductive, are much less conducive to the development of sound political judgment than the contested, multifaceted micronarratives that might emerge in their wake. The politics that develop out of enlivened, agonistic historical readings may, Brown concludes, offer "modest new possibilities for the practice of freedom" (p. 173).

Recalling Nietzsche's teutonic motto that "what doesn't kill me makes me stronger," Brown extols the practice of freedom in the space once occupied by the banisters and staircases stabilizing and directing modern political thought and life. Brown assumes contemporary democratic politics to be strong enough to survive such challenges. Should we share her optimism? Helping tattered narratives slide into oblivion may indeed "incite" virtue and, in a technocratic age, challenge domination, as Brown asserts. And I couldn't agree more with Brown's statement that the "permanent resistance" of the state by its citizens ensures their democratic life, even though the state guarantees their freedom to resist. But such resistance, if carried out in the absence of all ideals and principles, may harbor much political malfeasance—malfeasance that makes moralism appear to be, at most, a relatively benign annoyance.

Brown decries moralizers for being parasitic upon the power-infested social order that they spurn, and for which they offer "no real remedy" (p. 60). She's dead on the mark here. Yet, in many respects, Brown's own work nourishes itself upon the ragings of the moralists, and, like them, she does not stoop to offer concrete remedies. Brown also slides into nostalgia. Like the moralists she condemns, Brown occasionally pines for a former day when politics was ostensibly a realm of heightened freedom. She states, for instance, that "we inheritors of a radically disenchanted universe feel a greater political impotence than humans may have ever felt before" (p. 139). This sensibility, though popular among postmodernists, is hard to square with an historical sense. Are we to assume that the level of political impotence felt by various peoples of the past—the slaves of antiquity, medieval serfs, or colonial peasants, for instance—pales in comparison to that experienced by the people of our generation, say those citizens across the globe who regularly surprise the pundits at the polls, or those who helped topple the Berlin Wall? No doubt, the technocultural juggernaut that streamlines our world is an awesome force. Yet we must acknowledge that political freedom and opportunity can, and often do, coexist with increasing cultural homogeneity.

Notwithstanding these criticisms, Politics Out of History provides insightful, well-crafted essays addressing many important thinkers and texts. Readers will benefit from its critical exchanges, which extend a perspective developed in States of Injury, Brown's (1995) earlier work.

The Will to Empower: Democratic Citizens and Other Subjects. By Barbara Cruikshank. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1999. 160p. $41.95 cloth, $17.95 paper.

Clarissa Rile Hayward, Ohio State University

There is a certain comfort, a certain ease, with which many contemporary political thinkers reach for an ideal they call "democratic citizenship" in response to a wide range of problems produced by relations of power: problems of social and political inequality, for instance, problems of injustice, problems of exclusion and marginalization. In The Will to Empower: Democratic Citizens and Other Subjects, Barbara Cruikshank undertakes the important task of disturbing that ease. "Citizen," she argues persuasively, is not the atonym of "subject." Instead, a citizen is a particular kind of a subject, a subject forged in ways that not only enable but also, unavoidably, constrain human social and political possibility. Those who would criticize relations of power need to examine, Cruikshank suggests, the ways in which citizens are made: what she calls the "technologies of citizenship" (for instance, the pedagogic programs, the social services, the social movements) through which modern democratic societies produce members capable of acting politically—and inclined to act politically—to advance their individual and their shared interests.

Cruikshank examines these technologies through four case studies, which she uses to map the political logic of "empowerment" from a Foucaultian perspective. She considers, first, nineteenth-century reform movements led by philanthropists, social workers, and others, who emphasized self-help as a means to promoting the autonomy and the self-sufficiency of the poor. She turns, next, to the American antipoverty movement of the 1960s, in particular, the Community Action Program's mandate for "maximum feasible participation" by the poor in developing and implementing the programs meant to serve them. She considers, in addition, the self-esteem movement of the 1980s and the early 1990s, as well as recent efforts by welfare rights advocates to empower the poor to pursue and promote their own interests and to resist the forms of scapegoating practiced by conservatives since the Reagan years.

Cruikshank uses these case studies to advance three principle claims. First, she stresses that power need not be exercised by the state. Second, she argues that it need not be channeled through the actions of powerful agents who will and intend its effects. Third, she emphasizes that it need not take the form of overt coercion or force. On the contrary, Cruikshank's central claim is that the most effective forms of power solicit people's voluntary participation in efforts to mold them into the right kinds of subjects: to mold them, that is, into self-sufficient, politically active, empowered democratic citizens.

Cruikshank is certainly correct when she claims that "[d]emocratic relations are still relations of power" (p. 18) and that "empowerment is a power relationship" (p. 86). She gestures toward important distinctions when she writes that self-government can be performed "well" or "badly" (p. 2) and that empowerment, similarly, "can be used well or badly" (p. 86). She fails, however, to do the hard work of explaining and defending her view of what it means to engage in collective self-government "well," or to empower "well," as opposed to "badly."

Consider her treatment of the book's opening vignette, in which she describes her fruitless search for the face behind a local exercise of power. In 1989, Cruikshank writes, the trash dumpsters in her neighborhood suddenly were locked, preventing homeless people and others from scavenging for food and other discarded goods. She details her unsuccessful efforts to locate the agent(s) responsible for the decision, using the story to illustrate how power can operate in anonymous ways, through small decisions not directed by a powerful actor. As she elaborates this story, she alludes to a set of imprecise normative commitments that seem to play an important role in motivating the larger study. For instance, she explains the significance of the locks on the garbage bins this way: "Those struggling to stay out of the arms of the poverty industry now had no recourse but to steal their subsistence or submit to case management in one or another shelter or social service program. It seemed obvious to me that the space of freedom was shrinking..." (p. 10; emphasis added).

However, despite repeated references to freedom throughout the book, neither here not at any other point in the argument does Cruikshank explain how she envisions this "space of freedom." The closest she comes is at the end of a chapter on welfare rights activism, where she rejects as "not an effective mode of resistance" efforts to challenge publicly false claims about welfare fraud (p. 121). It is better, she asserts, to follow Foucault's counsel and "refuse what we are," that is, to probe critically and to resist and to challenge the processes through which subject categories—such as "welfare queen" and "democratic citizen"—are socially constructed, maintained, and policed. But Cruikshank never explains why such probing and contesting is a more effective form of resistance than the welfare rights activists' strategies that she dismisses. She never identifies the criteria she employs to determine that such forms of resistance are the best.

Producing citizens "well," she enigmatically suggests near the close of the book, is a matter of producing them "democratically" (p. 124). It is hard to imagine, however, what "democratically" might mean in the context of Cruikshank's larger argument that the democratic citizen itself is an effect of power. Nor is it clear why one would identify as a specifically democratic practice the Foucaultian notion of "refusing what we are."

Its shortcomings notwithstanding, The Will to Empower is an engaging book that raises important questions about social power and democratic citizenship. The text is clearly written and provides Foucaultian insights into these questions that will be accessible even to those not familiar with poststructuralist theory.

Our Sense of the Real: Aesthetic Experience and Arendtian Politics. By Kimberly Curtis. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1999. 224p. $39.95 cloth, $16.95 paper.

Robert Pirro, Georgia Southern University

Of particular interest in the proliferating scholarship on Hannah Arendt is how her thought has recently attracted sympathetic attention in areas of theoretical inquiry once considered problematic for her. So, for example, the Graecophile Arendt, previously dismissed by many feminist thinkers for failing to take adequate account of the machismo and misogyny of ancient Greek culture, has inspired a volume of sympathetic feminist readings of her work (Bonnie Honig, ed., Feminist Interpretations of Hannah Arendt, 1995). Respectful reconsiderations of the Eichmann controversy at symposia and in a recently published volume (Steven E. Aschheim's Hannah Arendt in Jerusalem, 2001) signal that the shadow once cast on Arendt's theoretical and personal integrity as an investigator of the nature and significance of modern Jewish identity has largely been lifted. To these efforts to engage sympathetically what were once considered the most problematic elements of Arendt's thought can be added Kimberly Curtis's highly interesting and rewarding book.

The main premise of Curtis's book is that a notion of aesthetic experience underlies Arendt's vision of political and human affairs, providing an ethical basis for the sort of participatory politics of which Arendt was such a prominent promoter. In casting Arendt as a theorist for whom aesthetic experience was not merely an analogy for politics but a constituent element of political thought and action, Curtis invites objections from several theoretical perspectives. To communitarians of the Left, the "aesthetic-existential drive" called for by Arendt's political vision would seem to lend itself too easily to a politics of self-indulgent, individualistic bluster (p. 34). Feminists might reasonably suspect that Arendt's affirmation of an "ontology of display" encourages an inappropriate attitude of aesthetically informed detachment from, if not contempt for, the material bases and requirements of life (p. 31). Liberal-minded theorists might justifiably wonder about the ethical implications of a polity in which people's relationships to each other and the world are so centrally mediated by aesthetic experience. Curtis responds directly to these and other challenges by theorizing the positive ethical significance of the aesthetic dimensions of Arendt's thought.

For Curtis, the ethical promise of Arendt's aestheticism lies fundamentally in the compelling ways in which her thought fosters a basic attentiveness to difference. "Her aestheticism is mindful-indeed driven-by the need for a world sufficiently common that human particularity and plurality can be cherished and saved, a world in which the tecture of reality is fullness as opposed to force" (p. 20). In Arendt's late reflections in "Thinking," Curtis finds an "ontology of display," according to which "reality in an appearing world is something born out of a highly charged mutual sensuous provocation between actors and spectators" (p. 31). Delineating this ontology against the backdrop of Arendt's encounter with Merleau-Ponty's later writings and her emphasis on the theatricality of the political world, Curtis emphasizes the mutuality of this impulse to self-display. Far from endorsing "a uni-directional, megalomaniacal urge to be admired by others," Arendt's intent is to show that political actors must take account of others because "our capacity to experience a world in common, to constitute a certain worldly solidity is utterly dependent on the engendering ground of plurality itself, on aesthetic provocation among multiple, distinct appearing beings" (pp. 33, 36).

The notion of an aesthetic pleasure founded on, and attentive to, difference and variety also underlies Curtis's insightful discussion of Arendt's "apparent devaluation of bodily existence and the concerns, practices, experiences, and outlooks peculiar to it" (p. 39). Acknowledging the deficiency in Arendt's conception of biological necessity, Curtis nevertheless attempts to wring some positive significance from this conception by considering it in relation to a notion of plurality and difference. According to this notion, appreciation of the unique rewards to be gained in the realm of freedom depends significantly on the existence of a realm of necessity whose different modalities foster an awareness of what freedom is and provide vitalizing respite from its demands.

The notion that attentiveness to plurality and difference carries with it a sort of aesthetic pleasure also frames Curtis's defense of the ethical relevance of Arendt's notion of thinking. Taking up Arendt's suggestion that the "inherent duality (of thinking) points to the infinite plurality of the earth," Curtis argues that the dialogical activity of thinking conditions us "when... we return to the world of appearances... to feel pleasure in the plurality of meanings that dialogue engenders," with the result that "our attentiveness to the world of particulars is enhanced" (p. 61).

In the middle chapter of the book, Curtis gives central place to the notion of oblivion, arguing that Arendt's theorizing, particularly her critique of modernity for its lack of public spaces, was driven by a recognition of the serious existential injury done to those who are deprived of the reality-enhancing rewards of public action. In aesthetically recasting Arendt's concern for "the insult of oblivion," Curtis rightly reminds us that the effectiveness of claims for social justice significantly rests on an underlying politically conditioned context of attentiveness to the reality of different others (p. 68). The dysfunctions of living in oblivion are especially manifest to Curtis in the examples of economic and social "enclaving"—gated communities and maquiladora-style labor districts—with which she begins her book.

Having emphasized the promise of Arendtian thought and politics to enhance aesthetically our appreciation of plurality and difference, Curtis poses judgment as a faculty capable of enhancing our sense of shared identity; it is the "means by which we join our 'particularized' selves to, and thereby engender... a world we... communicatively share" (p. 116). What Curtis contributes to the extensive secondary literature on Arendt's notion of judgment is a clearer understanding of how judging aesthetically fosters a sense of shared membership (which had in former times been passively dependent on the functioning of authority) by inviting us to "find (each others' judgments) beautiful insofar as they illuminate the profound and difficult need we have for countenancing others..." (p. 121).

In the last chapter, Curtis analyzes two episodes of political judgment from Arendt's life (concerning Zionist activities in the founding years of Israel and actions taken by Jewish councils under Nazi rule) and a story of a KKK official's personal and political transformation to illustrate the links she theorized earlier among the aesthetic, ethical, and political dimensions of human affairs. There are some missteps in the discussion of Arendt's controversial judgment of Jewish councils, including a not insignificant misquote—Arendt felt more grief by the wrongs done by, not "to," her own people (p. 135). Also, Curtis does not consider the complexities of Arendt's "membership in the community of Jews"—To what extent was there one community? and In which respects, if any, was that community "political"? (pp. 132, 135).

All in all, this book stands as an insightful defense and creative articulation of the aesthetic dimensions of Arendt's thought. Whether one is drawn to or put off by Arendt's aestheticism, this book is worth reading.

The Odyssey of Political Theory: The Politics of Departure and Return. By Patrick J. Deneen. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 2000. 275p. $35.00 cloth.

Aryeh Botwinick, Temple University

This thoughtful and innovative book seeks to locate the polarities between which the Western intellectual and political traditions move in terms of a struggle within Odysseus's soul between endless departures and explorations and burstings of limits and "homeward returns" to family and polity that register his awareness of the perdurability of limits. In the end, Odysseus identifies (however ambivalently) with those limits, and his struggles and resolutions as recounted by Homer help to establish a framework in terms of which Deneen locates and evaluates the debate between Martha Nussbaum and her critics concerning the attractions and deficiencies of cosmopolitanism as both an ethical and a political program and set of values.

The debate surrounding cosmopolitanism frames the book in its opening and concluding chapters—and the categorial distinction between "homecoming" and "cosmopolitanism" serves as the central organizing framework of the book. I believe that it is theoretically vulnerable. Part of the problematic of the "homecoming" versus "cosmopolitanism" distinction is that some version of localism and communitarianism tinges and links both notions. Cosmopolitans rhetorically promulgate and defend their views to establish a community with other cosmopolitans. Given the variety of voices in the international political arena, ranging from the anarchistic to the most vociferously nationalistic, cosmopolitans (atleast at this stage in the development of their political program) are trying to cultivate a community of like-minded individuals who perceive the world political situation and diagnose the moral imperatives residing within it in ways similar to their

Conversely, for those who give their loyalty to some version of a local nationality or political community, what is at stake is not something concrete in relation to the abstraction of "cosmopolis." As Benedict Anderson and others have argued, because of the variety of ways in which populations can be configured in relation to territorial units, nation-states themselves are imaginary or imagined communities conjured up out of the heterogeneous givens endemic to any recognizable political entity. The idea of any particular nation is underdetermined by the factors conducive to nationhood. In this important sense, nations are as fully abstract and "floating" as is cosmopolis.

The three middle chapters of this book are devoted to Plato's Republic, Rousseau's Emile, and Horkheimer and Adorno's Dialectic of Enlightenment—where Deneen argues that the character of Odysseus plays an important symbolic and subliminal role in the formulation of the argument. Deneen is interested in the reciprocal relationship between how these theorists construe Odysseus and the interpretive afterglow that those readings cast upon the "Odyssean metaphysic" in making sense of the Western past.

Part of the originality in this conception resides in its displacement of a Jewish Biblical point of origin for Western political and theoretical sensibility with a bipolarity within the Greek thought-world itself-between unbounded "departures" and the irrevocability of "return." The "return" aspect—the fastening upon the unimpeachability of limits (ethical, metaphysical, moral, religious)—is what traditionally has been identified as the Jewish pole of Western origins in works as diverse as Matthew Arnold's "Hebraism and Hellenism," Erich Auerbach's Mimesis, and Leo Baeck's "Romantic Religion." James Joyce, in Ulysses, effects a displacement in a direction contrary to the one pursued by Deneen in his book. The "homeward" drives in Odysseus' personality lead Joyce to translate him into a Jewish Everyman and Everywoman in the persons of Leopold and Molly Bloom. Apparently, Joyce perceives the homeward-bound constitutents of Odysseus's self as having their greatest theoretical, cultural, and political efficacy when embodied in the tenets and practices of monotheistic religion. There is a cryptic but tantalizing sentence early in Ulysses that reverberates with such an understanding. Joyce refers to the medieval Islamic philosopher Averroes and to the medieval Jewish philosopher Moses Maimonides as "dark men in mien and movement, flashing in their mocking mirrors the obscure soul of the world, a darkness shining in brightness which brightness could not comprehend" (James Joyce, Ulysses, Gabler ed., 1986, p. 23).

Following in the footsteps of Vico in The New Science who also serves as an important guide for Horkheimer and Adorno in their investigations), Deneen (p. 174) says that "the creative poet par excellence is Homer, from whom the West can credit its religious origins." Deneen sees the Odysseus who enjoys an exalted status in Plato's retelling of the Myth of Er at the conclusion of The Republic (presumably because of "the depth of his wisdom and prudence" and his pursuit of "the road of the philosopher") as suggesting on an implicit level a reconciliation of the vocations of the poet and philosopher whose coexistence within the confines of the same polity Plato finds so disturbing on an abstract theoretical level (p. 112). Deneen's reading provokes a question that it is not able to answer. If Plato is reinventing Homer to domesticate him to the requirements of philosophy, what are the background understandings of philosophy impelling Plato in this direction? Far more historically plausible and theoretically satisfying, it seems to me, is Hannah Arendt's reading of Plato's relationship to Homer in The Human Condition as inaugurating a series of unending "reversibility maneuvers" that characterize the enterprise of Western philosophy until the present day. According to Arendt, Plato turns Homer upside down. It is not life after death that is located in a cave, but "ordinary life on earth"; "the soul is not the shadow of the body, but the body the shadow of the soul"; it is those wedded to a cave-like existence here on earth who live a shadowy existence, and not "the soul after death in Hades" (Arendt, The Human Condition, 1958, pp. 265-66). Apparently, these reversibility maneuvers can be engaged in because Plato has detached words from things—has metaphysically identified an unbridgeable distance between words, concepts, and categories and the worldly furniture and phenomena to which they ostensibly refer.

If Deneen, in some not-fully developed way, did indeed want to locate a Greek placeholder for a monotheistic philosophical position that envisions an ever-expanding metaphysical middle, a much more promising source might have been Plato's Parmenides, where the One as the ultimate explanatory factor for phenomena has to be denied reality to preserve the integrity of its Oneness. If the One is accorded reality, it means that there are embodiments and analogues to it in experience that vitiate its Oneness. Tracing a Platonic, rather than a Homeric, source for the idea that our craving for contact with ultimate transcendence is inevitably thwarted, and that we are poised for a "homeward return," would enable Deneen to deal more charitably with Horkheimer and Adorno, and Rousseau, than he in fact does. Horkheimer and Adorno are best understood from a Platonic perspective as rearticulating in a catastrophic twentieth-century context the pathos of attempting to bridge the gap between the One and the Many. The One is now the solitary individual and the Many are the political community—but the solitary individual now harbors within himself traces of all those yearnings for and gropings toward transcendence that Plato prefigures in the Parmenides, and thus the absences and aborted deliverences that he experiences become the only palpable traces and reminders for him of all of those institutions from God to the political community that he is not able to sustain theoretically in a more direct, positive way. The solitary individual becomes the icon of the absent God.

Rousseau's and Horkheimer and Adorno's valorization of a beginning (the early phases of the state of nature a pure moment of enlightenment that does not get mired in the reifying and distorting mechanisms of myth [Deneen, pp. 152 and 185]) to which the imperative to return is overwhelming and the possibility of recovering is close to zero resonates with monotheistic sensibility derivable in one of its strands from Plato's Parmenides. This dialogue posits a God who is both the consummation of the intellectual exploratory quest and the existentialist quest for anchorage and who, precisely because He is the consummation of those quests (and logically distinct from our everyday existences), can never be retrieved on a literal level into any human present.

One final note: Perhaps, as Peter Green (The New Republic, July 12, 1999, p. 43) has reminded us, Homer's world (including Odysseus) is representative of a "joyful creed, preserved in oral tradition, of a Bronze Age aristocracy that loved life with a manic fierceness, and treasured it all the more for its brevity and perils." Perhaps there is an historical optical illusion here. What looks like a moment of return, an embrace of the middle, is really a single-minded, ecstatic embrace of life not as a pulling-back from a futile pursuit of transcendence but as representing the highest moment of intoxicating transcendence itself. If this is the case, then Deneen's reading of The Odyssey and its shaping influence on Western thought is a deliberately anachronistic reading that is already suffused with those Platonic and post-Platonic subtexts that I have described. In this case, I have (in at least some respects) only rendered explicit what is more submerged and contextual in Deneen's valuable book.

Beyond Tocqueville: Civil Society and the Social Capital Debate in Comparative Perspective. Edited by Bob Edwards, Michael W. Foley, and Mario Diani. Hanover, NH: University Press of New England, 2001. 340p. $25.00.

Steven Johnston, University of South Florida

Tocqueville observed, "I know of no country in which there is so little independence of mind and real freedom of discussion as in America." Moreover, he continued, "Freedom of opinion does not exist in America." With the United States committed to a war (not to be called a crusade) against terrorism, these words from Tocqueville seem apt. If indeed the world changed on 11 September 2001, perhaps it became Manichean. Good versus evil, civilization versus barbarism, modernity versus medievalism, freedom versus fundamentalism, us versus them: These are the terms of political discourse. In the new order, you are either with the United States and the World or you are against it. Time to decide. War abhors ambiguity.

I start with 11 September since the future of the American democracy is very much in question. What kind of insight might the "civil society debate" provide on the current situation? Social capital, collective trust, networks of association, social structures: Don't we need these things now more than ever? Robert Putnam would think so. In fact, in a New York Times op-ed piece of 19 October 2001, he says so. Fortunately, Americans are answering the call. They are giving blood, donating money, waving flags, and attending church. Concerned that the "new mood" might not last, Putnam offers recommendations to take advantage of "this resurgence of community involvement." For him, World War II has been recovered. This generation has its Pearl Harbor, and the greatest generation may have a worthy successor after all. The opportunity must not be squandered.

Beyond Tocqueville operates in and around the world according to Putnam. In one sense, the essays collected here challenge it. First and foremost, this means that Putnam's unidirectional causal logic is questioned. He contends that the health of democracy depends on the quality of its associational life. The editors and authors of this volume wish to contextualize this assessment. Edwards, Foley, and Diani, invoking Michael Walzer, argue that "a democratic civil society seems to require a democratic state, and a strong civil society seems to require a strong and responsive state" (p. 18). The essays in part one of this volume make a convincing case that Putnam's analytic needs to be complicated. Of course, I'm not sure that Putnam would object. Certainly the Putnam of the New York Times op-ed piece would not. For him, the state is key.

Where the Putnam debate gets interesting is on the question of politics. By and large, it seems to be missing in action. Ironically, then, Beyond Tocqueville performs the limitations of the civil society/social capital problematic. Thus the essays by Mark R. Warren, Debra C. Minkoff, and Jackie Smith, which seem to have been forced into the collection, stand out. They deal with politics at the local, national, and transnational levels, respectively. Here the struggle with Putnam and his interlocutors heats up. As Warren writes, "Although we need to reestablish a cooperative basis to American politics, the communitarian version of democracy is insufficient because it fails to appreciate politics as the realm of conflict and power as well as collaboration" (p. 172). What is more, the idea of social capital can be problematic, as Putnam concedes when he asks: Does it have a dark side? Is it inimical to liberty and tolerance? In Bowling Alone (2001, chap. 22), Putnam is pleased to report that tolerance actually seems to rise with civic engagement and participation in voluntary associations. If anything, the stay-at-homers are a cause for concern. Curiously, Putnam does not address the question of liberty-at least not what Berlin would call positive liberty. This is no accident. Tolerance can be tolerated because it is compatible with marginalization and exclusion. But liberty as self-determination may prove tougher to control. Social and political life might become messy,

Thus politics is suspect in Putnam's optic because it divides rather than unites. The editors observe, "Neo-Tocquevillian liberals and conservative proponents of civil society tend to ignore or actively exclude from consideration those sorts of organizations and activities that are associated with advocacy and political action ..." (p. 6). Hence the importance of Eastern Europe and Latin America, where contending conceptions of civil society feature contestation, struggle, life and death, politics. This volume suggests that there is a need to go not just beyond Tocqueville but also beyond Putnam. Consider the Times piece. Speaking of World War II, he writes, "Sacrifice was reinforced by popular culture from radio shows to comic strips. All Americans felt they had to do their share, thereby enhancing each American's sense that her commitment and contribution mattered." Yet as he celebrates mass loyalty oaths (16,000 strong in Chicago), he ignores Japanese-American citizens in internment camps who refused military induction and were sent to (another) prison. In short, not all Americans felt the same way. Putnam's wish for the present has become fact in the past, though surely he knows it's untrue—just as it is untrue today regarding Operation Enduring Freedom (not to be called Infinite Justice). Fortunately, pace Putnam, not all American citizens, let alone citizens elsewhere around the world, feel the same way about or agree on "the basic issues."

Nevertheless, America is united, though there seems to be a necessary underside to unity. George Bush redeems the imperial presidency and Congress abdicates its constitutional responsibilities. Homeland security demands the contraction of core liberties and the ACLU monitors the degradation. Be politically incorrect and challenge the dominant war narrative on ABC, and you will have to apologize to save your job, perhaps much more. Speak against the war at a college or university and you can find yourself on a McCarthyite hit list. It might be tempting to say that politics stops at war's edge, but Americans have been trained to hate politics in the best of times; in the worst of times, politics is un-American. What is wrong with this picture of democracy?

In the aftermath of 9–11, Robert Putnam has been pleasantly surprised by the "solidarity" Americans have displayed. "[T]his new period of crisis can make real to us and our children the value of deeper community connections." No doubt. But does Putnam's idealized civil society of blood-donating, flag-saluting, war-bond-buying Boy Scouts make for a healthy democracy? If you equate democracy with representation, stable majority rule, and ordered consensus, perhaps. But if you affirm a Machiavellian ethos and conceive political contestation as constitutive of freedom, you wonder. Where civil society theorists think socialization, democracy theorists suspect normalization.

Matters don't necessarily improve when Beyond Tocqueville takes an economic turn. Essays by Charles Heying, Michael Schulman and Cynthia Anderson, and Lane Kenworthy offer alternative accounts of declining social capital. Reversing the neo-Tocquevillian analysis, they address the dislocations stemming from globalization and economic restructuring. Grant them the primacy of economics in their causal arguments. Assume that production reigns supreme in the order of things and social capital follows. America's citizenship crisis cannot be solved by prosperity or government-induced economic cooperation. The latter are not designed to address the former. Once again, the civil society problematic proves to be of limited value in contemporary politics.

Fortunately, Minkoff and Smith prefer to explore the workings of national and transnational social movement organizations (SMOs). Entities like EarthAction and Greenpeace may or may not be "productive of social capital" (p. 183), but insofar as they embody democratization and pluralization the question becomes moot—especially if you don't presume that democracy invariably tends to anarchy as participation and enfranchisement flourish. These SMOs privilege social justice, human rights, and peace. Not surprisingly, then, the most interesting essays in this volume ultimately leave behind the civil society and social capital framework (as overly liberal democratic and state-centered) to ponder and research new social and political forms. To think about democracy principally in terms of social capital and trust may be to force it into an impoverished theoretical framework. A Mobilization for Global Justice campus chapter would trump a bowling league any day.

Social Rights Under the Constitution: Government and the Decent Life. By Cecile Fabre. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000. 202p. $72.00 cloth.

Katherine Fierlbeck, Dalhousie University

The relationship between economic redistribution and democracy has experienced a profound political shift in the past two decades, which we are only now beginning to analyze with any perspicacity or insight. This conceptual shift has consisted primarily in the ability of the administrations of Thatcher and Reagan, among others, to convince even the less well-off to support policies that seemed to widen the income gap, with the promise of securing greater absolute gains for all. Social reformers, who for the previous century had viewed democratic procedures and institutions as means of achieving a wider redistribution of wealth, were clearly flummoxed.

This book addresses this relationship directly and yet, ultimately, misses the substantial point underlying this shift. Fabre's aim is to explicate the relationship between social rights and democracy and thereby to make the case for the constitutional entrenchment of rights to adequate minimum income, housing, health care, and education. The novel aspect of Fabre's position is her claim that one ought not to base an argument for social rights on their intrinsic necessity to a "democratic" culture (e.g., the argument that social rights are required as a component of democratic citizenship). Indeed, she maintains that social rights are for the most part largely "undemocratic," but that this is nonetheless insufficient reason to reject them.

Instead of making social rights derivative of democratic rights, Fabre constructs her argument for an equal fundamental interest in having a decent life upon the principles of autonomy and well-being. This first step is both the most and the least contentious. It is contentious because her definition of autonomy is made to do a great deal of work. Autonomy, for Fabre, involves having not only personal capacities and the opportunities to choose from various opportunities, but, most significantly, access to opportunities (pp. 9-12). The reason we ought to have rights is not merely because we are autonomous (we generally hold that even nonautonomous individuals such as newborns have rights) but rather because "the kind of person who leads a decent life has special moral value" (p. 17). Thus, "if some of their needs are not met, people cannot be the kind of person who leads a decent life, because they cannot be autonomous and they cannot achieve well-being" (p. 18). The reason this claim is so contentious, of course, is that needs are socially determined (p. 35), and thus we are, in the author's account, obliged to provide something that we cannot clearly define, and that shifts from place to place and from one time period to another. And yet this is not a particularly contentious claim insofar as most liberal democracies do in fact make a sustained effort to provide such social goods at some minimal level precisely to provide a decent life for their citizens.

The real issue, then, is whether such rights ought to be constitutionalized; and the reason this leads to such dissension is because it raises the issue of political control over the monies raised through taxation. Democratic representation was, in both England and the United States, historically the product of a propertied class who felt that they were being taxed without having a say in how their monies were spent. Small surprise, then, that the same issue should raise the hackles of modern liberal democrats. One of the many strengths of this book is the sheer philosophical weight brought to bear by the author to address this single point. Fabre engages a wide range of major theorists in this debate (although, interestingly, Hayek is missing); and she does not hesitate to address the canon of liberal thought on their own terms to make her case.

Disputing the argument that "social rights ought not to be constitutionalized because they are positive rights," Fabre argues that social rights ought to be considered for their substantive importance rather than because they are the result of procedural fairness. This is the nub of Fabre's case: Because democracy is essentially a process, rather than a value system, one can coherently hold that social rights ought to be protected while, at the same time, asserting that to do so would be "undemocratic" (simply because such constitutional entrenchment might not be supported by the democratic majority). This is a lively but unconvincing discussion:

Simply to say that "democracies can and often do act unjustly" (p. 114), for example, is not itself persuasive, as one can just as easily (and more precisely) say that countries with democratic procedural systems can come to decisions that do not reflect democratic values. Further, Fabre argues that social rights are not democratic rights, as it is not necessarily true that poverty prevents people from being able to participate politically (except, perhaps, insofar as education allows us to comprehend political issues): Empirically, perhaps, this holds true, although one might object that insofar as a casual correlation can be established at all (i.e., the more indigent one is, the less likely one will be to participate politically), it ought to serve as grounds for the provision of social rights.

Nonetheless, this is not a severe objection to Fabre's case. It is admittedly much snappier to say that "social rights are undemocratic but ought nonetheless to be constitutionalized"; but one can still hold that social rights are a reflection of democratic values and ought to be constitutionalized, without relying upon the democratic nature of these rights. Thus Fabre constructs a lucid, tightly constructed, and intelligent argument against grounding social rights upon democratic criteria. The problem for proponents of social rights (among whom she counts herself) is that she is more persuasive in her defeat of democratically based social rights than in her construction of an alternative basis for social rights (viz., upon the values of autonomy and well-being); as noted above, much of this rests upon a very subjective appraisal of what ought to be required to live an autonomous and decent life. As most states do attempt to provide such necessities, the issue is not the principle of whether to provide them, but the level at which they ought to be provided. Fabre takes aim at this position and, in essence, asks liberals to put their money up front: If in fact they do accept that such services ought to be provided, why not allow nonelected officials (i.e., some level of judiciary) to determine the level? Ultimately, Fabre attempts to walk a middle ground between political representation and judicial protection by attempting to sketch out a system in which judges would determine whether or not the level of provision was acceptable, but elected governments would be responsible for finding a way to correct any deficiencies.

This is an excellent, cogently argued, and intellectually edifying book: and one that thinks about basic principles without divorcing them from the political context. However, the political force of the "new right revolution"—and the point that Fabre misses—is the claim that inequalities are justified (and that the level of taxation can never be taken out of the hands of the political representatives) simply because of the changing way in which wealth is produced: to wit, through a greater reliance upon international trade. Those who produce wealth, on this account, cannot be fettered by the demands of taxation (no matter how just those claims are) simply because by doing so we forfeit the larger social gains to be made if national enterprises can compete effectively internationally (which, again, on this account, requires minimal taxation). The problem, quite simply, is that counterfactual claims play a much greater role today in thinking about redistributive justice. As Fabre herself concedes, a government cannot justly interfere in favor of one beneficiary if by doing so "it undermines other people's prospects for a decent life" (p. 177). In just such a manner, Thatcher convinced a significant part of the electorate that the British welfare state interfered with people's prospects for a decent life and that the markets, rather than the courts or the executive, could provide this. This is not to condone this position, or to dispute the substance of Fabre's articulate and engaging argument. But the political success of this position, for better or for worse, does perhaps suggest that too much comes down to the issue of "Who determines what a decent life is?" and it is doubtful that the majority itself would be willing to let a few appointed officials decide.

Rebel Writer: Mary Wollstonecraft and Enlightenment Politics. By Wendy Gunther-Canada. DeKalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 2001. 224p. $38.00

Gina Luria Walker, The New School

This is a brave, important book that identifies and responds to the black holes between scholarly discourses and across genres to explain why and how Mary Wollstonecraft's texts should be recognized as "interrupting the fraternal conversation of political thought" (p. 42) among the men she herself described as "canonized forefathers." Reading carefully through selections from Wollstonecraft's writings letters, educational treatises, novels, the Vindications-Wendy Gunther-Canada elucidates the continuum of Wollstonecraft's radical political theory about gender differences. Rebel Writer traces Wollstonecraft's transformation from "arguably the eighteenth century's most rebellious female reader [to] its most revolutionary feminist author," as she contested the portrayal of women in Plato, Aristotle, Rousseau, Locke, Fordyce, and Gregory, struggling to devise a feminism characterized by "the powerful confrontations between woman and the word, between literature and philosophy" (p. 16).

Gunther-Canada deliberately situates Wollstonecraft in the existing abyss between Virginia Sapiro's (1992) "pathbreaking examination," A Vindication of Political Virtue, and literary theorist Gary Kelly's (1992) Revolutionary Feminism: The Mind and Career of Mary Wollstonecraft. Sapiro, Gunther-Canada advises, attempted to add Wollstonecraft to the lineage of masculine canonical thinkers but failed to examine the reasons for Wollstonecraft's continuing "marginalization" as an authoritative contributor to political theory. Kelly, she opines, "does a better job of theorizing genre, placing Wollstonecraft's works within the discursive context of the period, but he is ... blindsided by the politics of gender" (pp. 6-7). This is somewhat turgid going until Gunther-Canada begins to read out loud, moving through Wollstonecraft's words, demonstrating her openness to fruitful insights wherever they may be found. She is stronger in literary studies than history. For example, she misses Barbara Taylor's ongoing, innovative formulations (Barbara Taylor, "Mary Wollstonecraft and the Wild Wish of Early Feminism," History Workshop Journal 33 (1992); "For the Love of God: Religion and the Erotic Imagination in Wollstonecraft's Feminism," in Eileen Janes Yeo, ed., Mary Wollstonecraft and 200 Years of Feminism, 1997), particularly their focus on the unresolved tension between reason and desire in Wollstonecraft's thought, as in her life. And I assume that Janet Todd's trenchant biography, based on the correspondence, appeared too late to be considered (Janet Todd, Mary Wollstonecraft: A Revolutionary Life, 2000).

Nevertheless, the book overall is concise, brilliant, and readable, with the successive chapters linking and building upon the texts in chronological order. In "A Voice from the Void," Gunther-Canada scrutinizes Wollstonecraft's earliest surviving letters and publications to reveal a developmental approach from girl to woman that anticipates Gilligan. "The Rebel Writer and the Rights of Men" explores her extraordinary response to Edmund Burke's (1790) Reflections on the Revolution in France. "The Feminist Author and Women's Rights" offers a superbly integrated analysis of the nexus of the two Vindications. "Writing the Wrongs of Politics" is a bold exegesis of the posthumously published, uncompleted fiction, The Wrongs of Woman; or, Maria, in which Gunther-Canada claims that Wollstonecraft's change in literary genre from treatise to novel intentionally "highlighted a critical challenge to the discourse of political philosophy." Wollstonecraft, Gunther-Canada explains, "politicized the relationship of women to both fiction and philosophy by arguing that the sexual distinctions in eighteenth-century discourse structured and reinforced the social distinctions institutionalized by the law. Wollstonecraft radically contested the very terms upon which women enter the conversation of political theory" (p. 130).

I emphasize the impulse that compels Gunther-Canada to cast a wider conceptual net than is customary because, in addressing women's texts, it is crucial to acknowledge that they frequently emerge out of no codified, much less canonized, historical tradition and so demand to be considered from multiple directions. Rebel Writer demonstrates ably that this can be done.

This approach serves Gunther-Canada well in her analysis of Wollstonecraft's difficulties in writing women into the history of political thought. Interestingly, it is in her detailed analysis of The Wrongs of Woman that Gunther-Canada negotiates most skillfully between and among previous commentators from differing intellectual reference points, filling in what she declares is "missing" from our understanding. Wollstonecraft's final, fragmentary text, she writes, "offers a significant challenge to the foundations of eighteenth-century political thought. Both republican theorists on the Continent and liberal philosophers in England had defined their conception of the good society by constructing a public sphere composed of citizen fathers and an opposing private sphere of patriotic mothers. Wollstonecraft disputed the symmetry of this political cosmos, claiming that the power relationships that structured the institutions and processes of government were coterminous with those existing within the family" (p. 151). Wollstonecraft held the British government culpable, leaving women unprotected in the power struggles within their homes; she also held women responsible for complying with the distorted female representations they found in novels, conduct books, and existing laws that did not accurately or adequately reflect or respond to the realities of their lives.

Gunther-Canada concludes with a critique of two portrayals of Wollstonecraft that she describes as "fictions": Memoirs of the Author of 'A Vindication of the Rights of Woman', written by William Godwin (1798), Wollstonecraft's husband, six months after her death from the aftereffects of childbirth. and Frances Sherwood's (1993) Vindication. In her criticisms of Godwin's Wollstonecraft, Gunther-Canada joins other modern readers who blame Godwin for the repudiation of Wollstonecraft's feminism by women as well as men during the 150 years since his account appeared. Here Gunther-Canada falters, surprisingly. In William Pitt's repressive witch hunt in the late 1790s, Wollstonecraft was identified as the witch even before the Memoirs. That Godwin struggled to articulate what Wollstonecraft had described to her lover Gilbert Imlay as "a new language" that exploded the gendered conversation between men and women about the discursive categories of "masculinity" and "femininity" is an index to how contested the subject was. And why should we expect Godwin to have been better than his male contemporaries at learning or deploying this lexicon? My own research on Wollstonecraft's feminist colleague and intimate friend Mary Hays (1759-1843) suggests that there were other progressive "generous men" who supported the efforts of individual women, but no man embraced "revolutionary feminism" as a necessary part of the male agenda for advancing "unlimited toleration." We may be disappointed that Godwin's Wollstonecraft reflects more his reformist interests than hers, but writing with Wollstonecraft's manuscripts before him, Godwin achieved a new kind of ventriloquism, incorporating her ideas and phrases—"intellectual beauty," for example—into his narrative. I hope that Gunther-Canada will take another look.

Gunther-Canada's criticisms of Francis Sherwood's recent biographical fiction about Wollstonecraft, however, hit the mark. Godwin was on his own. Sherwood had at her disposal feminist thinking about Wollstonecraft from numerous perspectives over the past 30 years. Given the vagaries of trade publishing, Sherwood wasted a precious opportunity to give common readers access to an accurate amalgam of Wollstonecraft's life and work.

The freshness of Gunther's general evenhandedness as she reads her way along the parallel tracks of primary and secondary texts is welcome. Feminist scholarship is mature enough now to encourage inventive approaches to important thinkers that make use of other disciplines, even as they are grounded in the scholar's own. Joan Wallach Scott proposes a generous litmus test by which to calibrate commentary on Wollstonecraft: "The history of Wollstonecraft as a feminist... is the history of the uses made of her by subsequent generations" (Joan W. Scott, "The Imagination of Olympe de Gouges," in Mary Wollstonecraft and 200 Years of Feminisms, 1997, p. 37). Wendy Gunther-Canada has used her very well.

The Re-Enchantment of Political Science: Christian Scholars Engage Their Discipline. Edited by Thomas W. Heilke and Ashley Woodiwiss. Lanham, MD: Lexington Books, 2001. 266p. $70.00 cloth, $25.95 paper.

Jeanne M. Heffernan, Pepperdine University

The postmodern challenge to the rationalist paradigm long regnant in American higher education has shaken the foundations of the secular academy, opening it up to a diversity of voices hitherto unheard. Under this new dispensation, Alan Wolfe observers, "Room can be made for any group, including conservative Christians" ("The Opening of the Evangelical Mind," Atlantic Monthly [October 2000]: 76). Various Christian scholars have indeed received at least a hearing—if not a welcome—in this more open atmosphere. The work of historians, such as Mark Noll and George Marsden, and philosophers, such as Alvin Plantinga and Nicholas Wolterstorff, has commanded national attention in secular academic circles; they have brought a distinctively Christian voice to their discipline.

Thomas Heilke and Ashley Woodiwiss endeavor to do the same. In The Re-Enchantment of Political Science, Heilke and Woodiwiss present a collection of essays that attempts to respond to two difficulties that have created a double bind for Christian scholars: first, the lack of a distinctive tradition of intellectual inquiry among evangelicals and, second, the hostility of the mainstream academy to faith-informed scholarship. With the weakening of the philosophical foundations supporting the latter, the editors argue, Christian scholars are now well positioned to remedy the former. Specifically, Christian political scientists can bring their religious commitments to bear on the analysis of various topics within the discipline. The Re-Enchantment of Political Science presents this kind of integrated scholarship on a wide range of subjects in political theory, public policy, and international relations. In the estimation of Heilke and Woodiwiss, the nine essays in Re-Enchantment reflect "an awakening of fresh and creative ways whereby Christian academics are reassessing how their theological commitments inform and shape their responses to the reigning orthodoxies that constitute their disciplines" (p. 3).

The editors themselves present the most provocative essays in the collection. Each proposes a radical alternative to well-entrenched orthodoxies in mainstream political science. Heilke, for instance, argues that social science inherited the epistemological weaknesses of liberalism in understanding human phenomena and in consequence has been "ethically incoherent" (p. 56), unable to render an adequate moral assessment of the American regime. He contends that an Anabaptist perspective, in light of its rich anthropology and social vision, provides a better vantage point from which to critically assess political phenomena. Only a metanarrative like this, grounded in an "ontology of peace" (p. 55) and instantiated in a nonhierarchical, nonpolitical church, can adequately critique the powers that be and offer effective witness of a different model of human relationships.

Woodiwiss, too, delivers a spirited criticism of socialscientific historiography, challenging what he considers the standard Whiggish account of the rise of the liberal state and its purported commitment to religious toleration. If one adopts an "ecclesiocentric narrative" (p. 77) instead, he insists, a very different and more accurate story emerges. According to this counternarrative, the liberal state under the ruse of toleration actually displaced religion from its ecclesial context, thus privatizing it and rendering it susceptible to state manipulation. Such manipulation continues unabated, for Woodiwiss, most obviously in Rawls and Macedo, more subtly in Galston and Perry. The work of these liberal theorists reveals "liberalism's essential, necessary and ineliminable commitment to exclusionism . . . [its] permanent fingering of the Church as requiring scrutiny, surveillance and policing" (p. 79). As evidenced by various "public" theologies, Christians have too often been co-opted by the liberal regime and hoodwinked by its appeal to reasonableness and toleration. Rather than accommodate this view, he argues, Christians should adopt a postliberal democratic theory, recognizing the "agonistic" (p. 157) character of politics as well as their own status as a "subaltern counterpublic" (p. 158) in a post-Christendom world.

Not every essay in the volume offers quite as provocative, novel, and well argued a thesis as Heilke's and Woodiwiss', but the collection as a whole is very strong. Nearly every piece provides a stimulating, sophisticated argument that brings a distinctive theological perspective into dialogic contact with mainstream research. In so doing, the essays make a powerful case for faith-informed scholarship. Ironically, however, they also reveal the difficulty of creating a "Christian political science" (p. 5). While the editors acknowledge that such an enterprise "will not be univocal in its evaluations and interpretations" (p. 9), they may have underestimated the depth of divergence within the collection. Serious and seemingly intractable differences surface in several of the essays. Fault lines emerge along ecclesiological, hermeneutical, and ethical lines. Dan Philpott, for instance, eloquently appeals to "Christ's love expressed as benevolence" (p. 250) as part of a justification for military action in the service of humanitarian intervention, an effort that Heilke's Anabaptism would prohibit. Likewise, Philpott's anthropology, rooted in the Thomistic natural law tradition, would differ markedly from Paul Brink's "relational" (p. 89) conception, informed as it is by Luther, Calvin, and Barth. So, too, would Clarke Cochran's commendation of Roman Catholic ecclesiology draw Heilke's criticism, while Cochran's reliance upon the concept of the "common good" might strike Woodiwiss as a "Constantinian" (p. 159) concession.

Despite these points of difference, the essays also reveal even deeper convergences. The common assumptions they share about creation, the nature and mission of Christ, and the social orientation of the Gospel are profound. From these commonalities exciting possibilities emerge. The work of Timothy Sherratt and Stacy Hunter Hecht, for instance, suggests that in combination the Calvinist and Catholic concepts of "sphere sovereignty" (p. 126) and "subsidiarity" (p. 201) have important theoretical and practical utility in assessing the performance of the modern state. Also, Brink's endorsement of pluralistic politics as best aligned with the relational character of the imago Dei dovetails well with the "counterpublic" model of Christian political action espoused by Woodiwiss. These kinds of ecumenical overlap indicate that the Christian "community of scholars" (p. 32) Michael LeRoy anticipates will have much to discuss.

Fortunately, if the essays in The Re-Enchantment of Political Science are predictive, this discussion will not simply be intramural. It will engage other scholars from across the discipline in an open and vigorous exchange of ideas. Such an enterprise, as Alan Wolfe suggests, would enrich secular and religious scholars alike.

Public Space and Democracy. Edited by Marcel Hénaff and Tracy B. Strong. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2001. 256p. $49.95 cloth, $19.95 paper.

Margaret Kohn, University of Florida

Until recently space was a highly suspect concept in political theory. The linguistic turn that has dominated the discipline for the past 20 years has multiple roots. Derrida's critique of pure presence, Foucault's discourse analysis, and Habermas's communicative action, in different ways, contributed to an emphasis on language over place. Recent work in geography and cultural studies, however, has begun to reserve this trend.

The essays in Public Space and Democracy contribute to this renaissance by exploring "the nature and status of the space in which human beings encounter each other with the intention of determining how their lives should be lived" (p. 1). The editors, Tracy Strong and Marcel Hénaff, pose two questions that link together the diverse essays. Does political life require a space in which collective concerns can be expressed and contested? And do modern technologies such as television and the Internet transform the possibilities of public space? The latter question is motivated by the suspicion that new technologies diminish the importance of space by transgressing geographical borders and undermining the need for face-to-face contact.

Before it is possible to answer these questions, it is necessary to provide a preliminary definition of space. The essays rely on a wide range of approaches; in fact, the editors point out that "the word space has taken on a metaphorical meaning and designates an ensemble of social connections, political institutions, and judicial practices. The literal meaning has almost been wiped out" (p. 35). My question is whether the concept of space can help us draw needed analytic distinctions if it becomes a synonym for such diverse alternatives as representation, discourse, or social relations.

While none of the essays in the collection engages in a sustained consideration of space as a concept, the editors provide a useful framework in their introduction. They distinguish among public, private, sacred, and common space. A public space is a human construct that facilitates seeing and being seen: Public space has both a physical and a social dimension. The social dimension is captured by the term "theatrical," which suggests the importance of visibility and self-presentation (p. 5). A public space also has a distinctive architectural property: openness. Open spaces like the ancient agora and the renaissance piazza are public in a way that back alleys are not. A private space, on the other hand, is characterized by the way in which individuals or groups can exclude outsiders. Thus private space is a matter not only of ownership but also of regulation and control of access.

Strong and Hénaff wisely present these definitions as poles at opposite ends of a continuum rather than stable categories. It is immediately apparent that some of the most important contemporary sociopolitical sites seem to undermine this distinction. For example, shopping malls (the topic of Benjamin Barber's essay, "Malled, Mauled and Overhauled: Arresting Suburban Sprawl by Transforming Mall into Usable Civic Space") provide a stage for seeing and being seen. Malls are open, theatrical, and constructed and therefore they meet Strong and Hénaff's definition of public space. While malls clearly entice and invite the general public, they are also based on the ability to exclude anyone who potentially disrupts the carefully calculated atmosphere of safety, cleanliness, order, leisure, and desire. As Barber points out, the most urgent problem today is the way that private simulacra come to replace public places; shopping malls and theme parks sell a sanitized substitute "where people can experience the thrill of the different without taking any risks" (p. 206) Similarly, new urbanist developments turn community itself into a commodity that can be purchased for the price of a white picket fence and wraparound porch.

Other sites transgress the line between public and private in politically significant ways. Publicly owned places such as the sidewalk in front of the post office are open and generally accessible but only to consumers and not to citizens. By this I mean that individuals who want to exercise their first amendment rights by gathering signatures, soliciting donations, or handing out leaflets may be forbidden from doing so, even on the publicly accessible portions of government property. Conversely, places such as back alleys and back rooms, which fail to meet Strong and Hénaff's criteria of "openness," are often important political sites precisely because limited visibility prevents surveillance and control. This raises the possibility that semiprivate spaces such as the Masonic lodges that made up Habermas's public sphere may nurture counterhegemonic ideas and practices more effectively than public places. While public space is undoubtedly political, the mass rituals of the Fascist and Nazi regimes suggest that it is not necessarily democratic.

Anne Norton's lyrical essay "Writing Property and Power" effectively captures the ambivalent quality of public space. She takes graffiti as a point of departure for her Heideggerian-inspired analysis of dwelling in urban space. For graffiti artists, writing on walls is a way to acquire "a place of shelter... to persist when one is absent" (p. 198). It is a way to take possession through ownership that is based not on alienable or exclusive custody but on what Henri Lefebvre called a right to the city. Through graffiti, the invisible becomes visible and the silent speak. Norton's discussion provides the ideal counterpoint to Barber's description of the decline of public space. She draws attention to the way that the city serves as a site of contestation over legibility, habitability, and power.

The other eight essays in the collection place less emphasis on the political and cultural effects of the built environment. Instead, they employ space as a metaphor for social relations or the phenomenal world of appearances. In "Voice and Silence of Public Space: Popular Societies in the French Revolution," Shigeki Tominga traces the rise and fall of political clubs in France. He focuses on the contested role of voluntary associations in French revolutionary theory. On the one hand, the political clubs seemed reminiscent of feudal corporate bodies, which constrained the freedom of the individual and decreased identification with the state as a whole. On the other hand, they could potentially contribute to revolutionary praxis by linking print and oral culture, thereby providing political education and fostering deliberation. However, the radical politics of the Popular Societies, combined with the general suspicion of intermediary associations, ensured their demise. Tominga concludes that the disintegration of the nascent public sphere "suggests that the rational social processes... contained the very seeds of irrationality" (p. 92). The flaw in this otherwise interesting essay is that Tominga fails to explain the descent from deliberation to denunciation (what he calls "voice" and "noise") in the Popular Societies.

In "Theatricality in the Public Realm," Dana Villa provides the explanation missing from Tominga's piece. According to Villa, Hannah Arendt thought that the search for "intimacy and warmth" in the fraternité trumpeted by the French Revolution was among the causes of its downfall. The decline of theatricality and the rise of intimacy and community had political consequences. By reconfiguring politics as a function of personal identity, this tendency made "it less likely that one's political opponents will escape demonization on the basis of who they are ..." (p. 168). The implication is that coming together in voluntary associations or political clubs does not create a public realm if such places do not reflect an ethos of worldliness.

Since the conceptual boundaries of "space" are not yet established, a wide array of concerns can potentially illuminate the theme of public space and democracy. The unevenness of the collection probably reflects the difficulty of beginning to theorize relatively uncharted terrain. My primary reservation about the book is that its title is something of a misnomer. Perhaps "Theatricality and Representation in Political Theory" would better capture the themes that the majority of the essays explore. For example, in chapter 2 Paul Dumouchel focuses on the issue of representation in Hobbes. In chapter 3 Jacqueline Lichtenstein explains why the French dramatist Corneille is "no doubt the most important political thinker of the seventeenth century." Peter Euben's "Aristophanes in America" (chapter 5) shows how ancient comedy and its contemporary progeny (the Simpsons, the Honeymooners) reinforce a democratic ethos by denaturalizing our most hallowed political conventions. While the latter essay, in particular, was a delight to read, students of political space should not overlook the editors' provocative conclusion that "we should say farewell to the old model of a monumental public space" (p. 230). In nine short pages, Strong and Hénaff raise the most urgent problems in the whole book; most notably they reflect on the way new technologies facilitate "unsited spaces" (p. 224), which transform our understanding of space itself. Had the majority of contributors followed their lead, the book could have done more to advance our understanding of public space and democracy.

Ecology and Historical Materialism. By Jonathan Hughes. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000. 219p. $59.95 cloth, $22.95 paper.

Terence Ball, Arizona State University

What can Marx and Marxian theory teach us about environmental problems and their possible solutions? One view is: not much, except about how not to think about the natural world and human beings' place in it. Marx himself sometimes spoke in the hubristic nineteenth-century idiom of the coming human "mastery" or "conquest" or "pacification" of nature, and most self-described Marxists have assumed that human happiness and social harmony go hand in hand with the human domination of nature. This interpretation of Marxian theory, when put into practice, has produced ecologically disastrous results of the sort described in depressing detail in Judith Shapiro's (2000) Mao's War Against Nature. But there is another way to read Marx that leads to altogether different conclusions, as we see in the work of Alfred Schmidt (The Concept of Nature in Marx, 1971), Howard Parsons (Marx and Engels on Ecology, 1977), Reiner Grundmann (Marxism and Ecology, 1991), and now in Jonathan Hughes's Ecology and Historical Materialism.

While it is true that Marx spoke of the human mastery of nature, he also emphasized humans' dependence on nature, and vice versa. That human beings are a part of nature and can never be apart from it is a view that Marx shares with modern environmental or "green" thinkers. It is this "interdependence" view that provides a point of entry for greens who seek a rapprochement between Marxian theory and modern ecology. A central feature of Marx's materialism, Hughes argues, is the idea that the natural world sets constraints upon what human beings can do and produce while, at the same time, human beings transform the natural world, thereby altering the constraints. But there are natural limits to the degree and kind of such alteration: Nature is malleable and transformable, but not infinitely so. Marx recognized this, albeit through a glass darkly: He had hardly an inkling of what twentieth-century technology might produce. That said, his theory is interpretable and adaptable in ways that allow us to address twenty-first-century environmental problems in a newer, subtler, and more illuminating way than most "green" political theory does. This is the task that Hughes sets himself, and at which he very largely succeeds.

On the whole, Hughes's view of the environmental or green movement is highly critical but broadly sympathetic. He holds that their theorizing is weaker than it would be if it were informed by Marxian theory, properly understood. For example, although greens acknowledge human dependence on nature, they balk at acknowledging that nature as we (can) know it is in turn dependent on human beings. They see nature as pristine, unspoiled, and best left alone by humans. But this, Hughes argues, is not an option. It is the nature of our species to transform nature and thereby ourselves. But such transformation need not—pace orthodox reds and radical greens—be tantamount to human exploitation or domination of nature. Moreover, many greens are (in an older Marxian idiom) philosophical idealists instead of materialists. That is, they think that a particular mind-set—anthropocentrism—is the root cause of environmental problems and that a change of mindset will bring about the desired changes and humans can then live humbly and harmoniously with nature. This, Hughes argues, is to take a too-simple view of the humannature relation and thus of the environmental problems that arise therefrom. A big bracing dose of Marxian materialism can serve as a useful antidote and corrective.

Much of modern environmental discourse is implicitly Malthusian, in that it asserts (or assumes) that a population tends to outstrip the resources required to sustain it. This theme is sounded in the "limits to growth" studies, in the efforts of Zero Population Growth and other groups, and in the work of Garrett Hardin, Paul and Anne Erlich, William Catton, and other environmentalists. Hughes goes straight to the source—Parson Malthus's (1798) An Essay on the Principle of Population-examining the arguments and then turning to Marx and Engels's critiques of Malthus, which, in broad outline, Hughes finds persuasive but in need of qualification. Marx and Engels argued that the growth of scientific knowledge and technological innovation extend the human capacity to produce resources beyond the limits that Malthus foresaw. Hughes turns their argument against the "green Malthusians" but allows that the upshot of the Marxian critique is to (technologically) extend and "relativize" the natural limits to growth (chap. 2). The green Malthusians are right to be worried but wrong to be absolutists and pessimists.

Hughes then considers arguments (or more often assertions) advanced by green thinkers to the effect that the "scientific method" is mechanistic, atomistic, and reductive and is thus unable to grasp the complex interdependencies that characterize the natural world. Insofar as Marxian theory claims to be scientific, it too is tarred with brush. Hughes rejects this as so much outdated metaphysical mumbo jumbo, and defends Marxian theory as being acutely sensitive to complexly causal interdependencies and therefore more adequate than rival theories in addressing ecological problems (chap. 3). He next considers (chap. 4) critics who claim that historical materialism, as developed by the "mature" Marx, abandons the ecological sensibilities of the "young" Marx. Instead of an "ecological break" between the two Marxes, Hughes finds theoretical consistency and continuity.

The remainder of Hughes's book attempts to show that the "productive forces" can, but need not, develop in environmentally destructive directions, thereby paving the way for an "ecological Marxism" (chap. 5). One troubling feature of Marx's vision, however, is his claim that the development of the productive forces is accompanied by ever-expanding human needs. Must the satisfaction of these needs result in further environmental degradation? Hughes strives mightily, and with mixed success, to show that the answer is: may be not, especially under socialism (chap. 6). This is a rather equivocal end to Hughes's sustained and systematic defense of the possibility of an ecological Marxism. He does, however, succeed in forcing readers to reexamine a number of key questions that must be addressed by any adequate environmental theory.

Christian Faith and Modern Democracy: God and Politics in the Fallen World. By Robert P. Kraynak. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 2001. 352p. $49.95 cloth, $24.95 paper.

Politics, Theology and History. By Raymond Plant. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001. 380p. $69.95 cloth, $24.95 paper.

Clarke E. Cochran, Texas Tech University

Religion and politics is a burgeoning subfield. Liberalism—communitarian literature now includes attention to religious communities. Theorists of civil society recognize that religious organizations implement a considerable range of policies. Since pluralism entails the presence of multiple voices in public conversation, theorists debate how a liberal society should treat religious voices. Theorists within religious traditions debate the bearing of faith on political action and the extent to which churches should cooperate with state institutions.

The present books, both by political theorists, contemplate these topics and others. Raymond Plant delivers the more comprehensive treatment of political theorists (philosophers and political scientists) and political theologians (theologians and clergy). Robert Kraynak offers an iconoclastic account of the relationship of Christian faith to modern democracy. It is the more unified and tightly organized book, but one whose style is more popular and tone more polemical. The same two themes organize each book: (1) Does liberal democracy require a moral foundation? and (2) What is the proper orientation of Christian political theology toward liberal society? Plant and Kraynak answer "yes" to the first question and agree that establishing this foundation is difficult, Plant because there is no single Christian political theology. Kraynak, on the other hand, believes that there is a single Christian political theology, but it is neither liberal nor democratic. Kraynak's is thus the more stimulating book, rethinking liberal democracy and Christian political theology.

Politics, Theology and History contains three parts. Chapters 2–6 consider the possibility of a Christian political theology. That is, can Christian beliefs be related in a coherent and rigorous way to the problems of politics, economics, and society? Chapters 7–10 ponder the moral foundations on which modern liberal democracies rest. Part III is Plant's theoretical resolution of the issues.

Plant focuses on the tension between universal and particular. A political theology deduced from the doctrine of God, creation, and the human person in principle is universal, but its high level of generality cannot ground particular judgments. On the other hand, political theology grounded in the particular is fragmented (p. 19). Plant finds this dilemma analogous to the liberal—communitarian debate, in which the liberal side achieves universality, but at the price of empty proceduralism. Communitarians achieve particularity but are trapped in cultural relativism.

Plant approaches the problem through accounts of four theological systems and their principal proponents. In the first system history mediates the universal and the particular. Its chief representatives are Augustine, Calvin, and Hegel and, more recently among the theologians, John Cobb and Wolfhart Pannenberg. Plant is strongly attracted to the necessity and possibility of a theology of history but concludes that modern theology cannot overcome the limits of Hegelianism. He does not consider Kraynak's strategy of resurrecting an Augustinian theory of history.

If historical theology fails, perhaps systematic theology (represented chiefly by older figures such as Karl Barth and T. H. Green) or narrative theology (represented by contemporary theologians George Lindbeck and Stanley Hauerwas) can ground political theology (chapter 5). Narrative theology, however, furnishes a devastating critique of any attempted systematic political theology, yet it fragments moral community, leaving no foundation for liberal culture. Natural law theology (chapter 6) remains. Plant furnishes a solid, though brief, account of natural law and the contemporary challenges to it, concluding that the fact/value dichotomy, the naturalistic fallacy, and moral diversity undermine natural law's foundational capacity.

Plant's preliminary conclusion is that "there can be no wholly definitive or authoritative political theology and, indeed, no authoritative political praxis associated with it, since the methodological controversies are so profound" (p. 173). This being the case, believers have two unattractive alternatives: either to privatize their most profound beliefs or to become internal exiles within liberal democracy. Yet the most important political, social, and economic issues of modern life call upon moral principles. Plant uses Part II to make this case, showing that markets have moral underpinnings (chapter 7), that neoliberal market theory is inadequate (chapter 8), that rights by themselves cannot supply the basis for a liberal society (chapter 9), and that neither theological nor philosophical communitarians can make community the sole support for liberal society (chapter 10).

Part III promises Plant's account of the contribution of political theology to liberal society. Yet the failure of liberal neutrality (in its utilitarian, contractarian, Rawlsian, and perfectionist forms) occupies most of these two chapters. Only briefly does Plant articulate his own commitment to establishing common moral ground through dialogue among persons situated in particular communities. Such dialogue seems the place for Christian political theology.

There is much to admire in Politics, Theology and History. Most useful for political scientists is the careful attention to major political theologians. Those seeking a précis find sure-footed guidance. Nevertheless, the book is very slight on Plant's own proposals, and his conclusions are not always clear among the summaries of a wide variety of theorists. Nor is it evident why certain materials receive major attention (V. A. Demant, in chapter 6) or whether certain "set pieces" are necessary (the dated discussion of communitarianism in chapter 10).

Kraynak's focused polemical argument is more satisfying for those seeking a definite position strongly defended. Where Plant argues that liberal society needs a moral foundation, but cannot find a suitable candidate, Kraynak asserts that liberal democracy "needs God" (xiii) and that Christian foundational beliefs about creation, fall, and redemption supply the hidden intellectual capital sustaining modern democracy. This is the briefer of Kraynak's two main arguments. Its ironic counterpoint is that, looked at a afresh, Christianity is far less liberal and democratic than its proponents realize. Another ironic twist, of which Kraynak is less aware, is that secular liberal democrats readily accept the truth of this second argument, employing it to undermine his first Kraynak principally targets those who accept the amalgam of Christianity and liberal democracy. He claims that they too readily accept the legitimacy of democracy and the human rights regime, reading such notions uncritically back into biblical concepts such as humanity's creation in the image of God. The amalgam, however good it is for democracy, is dangerous to Christianity. He traces the growth of Christian support for democracy primarily to Kantian enlightenment ideas (chapter 3), founded on principles of human individuality and autonomy at odds with Christian faith.

The core of Christian Faith and Modern Democracy is a review of Scripture and the tradition of Christian theology (primarily Western, but Orthodoxy makes a welcome appearance) to establish that the Christian conception of persons, politics, and church is hierarchical and incompatible with modern human rights. Chapter 2 argues that this position is the Bible's and that it belongs as well to the central tradition of Christian theology, especially Augustine, but also Aquinas, Luther, and Calvin. Augustine's two-cities analogy figures prominently. The image of God, Kraynak admits, exalts humanity, but only in the spiritual realm, not the political. Moreover, the spiritual includes hierarchical degrees of perfection that do not fit modern, democratic principles. The earthly city displays no single, best form of government; rather, prudence points to different forms in different times and cultures.

Kraynak effectively challenges shallow identifications of liberalism with Christianity, but some of his Biblical interpretation is tendential and over simple (covenant in chapter 2). The claim of Christian democrats at their most sensible is not that the Bible touts democracy, but that its view of human dignity, when enriched by historical experience and developing Christian reflection, grows toward modern human rights and political equality.

The heart of the book's positive claim is the argument for the superiority of "Christian constitutionalism" (chapters 4 and 5). There are two separate contentions here, which Kraynak yokes too closely. The first is that liberalism's commitment to Kantian-style human individuality and moral autonomy is antithetical to Scripture and Christian theology. This argument seems correct. Christian social theory is social, not individualistic, and it insists that human freedom, precious as it is, must be oriented to truth and the will of God. Yet this does not entail Kraynak's second claim, that Christian theology cannot articulate a strong theory of rights and democratic government on its own terms. Yet even Kraynak admits that Christian democracy, if it could keep Kant firmly in a theoretical box, can be a legitimate expression of Christian theology (pp. 120–24, 163–66).

Kraynak, however, doubts the likelihood of controlling Kantian assumptions, so he argues instead the superiority of constitutional monarchy to modern democracy. His great heroes are Augustine and Solzhenitsyn. Yet he recognizes that, prudentially, democracy is the most likely near-term political system. Therefore, the second-best regime is "constitutional democracy under God," a democracy that recognizes its limits and guarantees independence to divinely ordained institutions such as church and family.

This final argument, despite its appealing challenge to conventional pieties, is perhaps the least satisfactory, for it is rather a hodgepodge of historical and theoretical claims. Too many difficult questions receive little exposition, and other nonliberal possibilities are not explored. Ultimately, Kraynak fails to make clear just how different "constitutional democracy under God" is from a liberal democratic alternative that would restrain its Kantian elements. Moreover, if on Kraynak's assumptions, there is a single normative biblical model of the family and the church, why should Christians not follow also a biblical model of government without any element of constitutionalism? In addition, why does the communitarian alternative appear so seldom? It has appeal for many Christians (Plant, for example) and in some versions challenges the same liberal assumptions as does Kraynak. Finally, the book's appreciation of prudence is a welcome relief from universalist arguments, but the politics of prudence may well be more culture-dependent than Kraynak allows

Each book is a worthy addition to a literature growing in size and sophistication. Plant is the more useful for a graduate seminar; Kraynak, for an undergraduate class. Their serious engagement of theological materials, despite flaws, is a refreshing sign of the revival of political theology. Its reemergence in political science signals a welcome broadening of our discipline's vision.

Alfarabi and the Foundation of Islamic Political Philosophy. By Muhsin S. Mahdi. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2001. 240p. $37.50.

Joshua S. Parens, University of Dallas

Mahdi's book marks a watershed in scholarship on medieval political philosophy. For the specialist, chapter 5, on the Book of Religion, alone would be worth the price of the book as a whole. The same could be said for the most synoptic chapter, chapter 7. For the more general reader and, especially, the teacher of political philosophy, the introductory section of the book will prove to be an indispensable resource. Introductions to medieval Islamic philosophy have appeared in great profusion in recent years. Part One of this book constitutes the best introduction to medieval Islamic political philosophy and may do the same for Islamic philosophy as a whole. Until now, no one has explained sufficiently why the first truly great efflorescence of philosophy within the Islamic world should be so deeply political. The peculiar character of this founding of medieval Islamic (political) philosophy has much to do with the relative inattention to Alfarabi in Western scholarship, despite his towering role in medieval Islamic and Jewish thought. With this book, we have reason to hope that Alfarabi will begin to garner the attention he deserves.

Recent events underscore the need for us to take great Muslim thinkers, especially underutilized and understudied political philosophers, more seriously. Of course, this is not to say that Alfarabi holds immediate solutions to contemporary problems, but at a minimum he can remind us when we become forgetful of the "broad historical impact of these (revealed) religions" (p. 169). Furthermore, he may offer clues about how better to adjudicate the conflicting claims of politics and prophetic religion in the modern Muslim world, an objective no longer wished for merely by Muslims.

The following are all of special contemporary relevance: Alfarabi's assessment and transformation of the Muslim teaching on war (pp. 139–44), the advantage he takes of the relatively minor role played by prophecy in the founding of Islam to expand the role of reason in guiding the religious community (pp. 164–65), and the difference between Alfarabi's medieval cyclical view of history (pp. 233–35) and the modern effort to "unbend" the circle of history (p. 239).

Of these especially "relevant" arguments, the second is directly linked to the central argument of Mahdi's book. His argument is that Alfarabi's Enumeration of the Sciences (ES) and the Book of Religion (BR) form the theoretical core of Alfarabi's "philosophy of religion." Consequently, the oddities of his Political Regime (PR) and Virtuous City (VC) become more comprehensible as two possible applications of the theoretical teaching of ES and BR. Mahdi's account is superior to Miriam Galston's (1990) in Politics and Excellence because it distinguishes properly between the theoretical role of BR and the lesser, applied role of PR and VC.

The core of Mahdi's argument about BR is that revelation or the royal craft plays the role of "determination" of particulars (p. 103) played by "practical judgment" (phronesis) in Aristotle (p. 105). In contrast, "actions and opinions as universals and general rules... remain the preserve of practical and theoretical philosophy" (p. 103). The only challenger to the preeminent role of phronesis is imagination in VC. Indeed, it would seem that the prophetic imagination lays claim to both the particulars of phronesis and the universals of practical and theoretical philosophy. (Mahdi gives a broad but extremely telling analysis of the roots of this widely-held view in his elegant introduction to this chapter [chapter 5, pp. 147-50].) Yet Alfarabi allows prophecy such pretensions only within the confines of a "pre- or subpolitical" treatment of revelation (pp. 159-61). In Alfarabi's political treatment of "the achievement of a human being's highest perfection and for the excellence of the city he founds and rules," revelation and its philosophic supplement fill the role previously played by prophecy (p. 162). In the light of Mahdi's argument, not only do the apparent redundancies within Alfarabi's teaching fade away but also the apparent absence of a direct treatment of phronesis in Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed (a source of some contemporary scholarly controversy) begins to make Mahdi describes Alfarabi's political philosophy as a whole as the "philosophy of religion," especially in the central chapter on BR, chapter 5. In contemporary usage, this phrase usually refers to the study of "religious experience" as the subjective experience of the believer. Because this contemporary approach to religion is an inheritance of the Enlightenment's subjectivization and privatization of all religious claims, we will be misled if we expect such a treatment from Alfarabi. In his Introduction, Mahdi gives an appropriately sketchy portrait of Alfarabi's "philosophy of religion" as establishing a connection between Platonic political philosophy and revealed religion (p. 2). In the body of his text, he does not begin to treat it explicitly until page 97, where he contrasts it with the ancient "philosophy of the city" and the modern "philosophy of the state." Here the reader begins to appreciate more fully that Mahdi, following Alfarabi, understands religion in a sense altogether foreign to most contemporary readers. Religion, in the original, premodern sense of the revealed religions, is a political phenomenon similar at least in genus to the ancient city and the modern state. (For a beautifully nuanced treatment of the relevant Arabic term translated religion [milla], see pages 108–109, especially page 109, note 3.) What, then, distinguishes religion from the city and the state? It is tempting to suppose that the difference is merely one of scale. If so, however, there would be no significant difference between ancient and medieval political philosophy. Perhaps the most significant difference is revealed in the concluding section of Mahdi's book on Alfarabi's cyclical view of history. Although in the pagan world the cycle was returned to its beginnings by natural cataclysms, revealed religion interrupts this cycle at an inopportune moment (pp. 233-35). This fact may account for the characteristically modern effort to unbend the circle by cutting out part of it, indeed, the very part of greatest interest to Alfarabi and his student Maimonides (pp. 237-40). Mahdi's conclusion, in particular, outlines with great clarity the distinction between medieval and modern political philosophy, a distinction that it has become all too popular to efface in recent scholarship.

Politics, Philosophy, Writing: Plato's Art of Caring for Souls. Edited by Zdravko Planinc. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2001. 261p. $19.95

Brent S. Lerseth, Dickinson State University

The edited volume Politics, Philosophy, Writing attempts to contribute to the reinterpretation of Plato's dialogues by clarifying some issues they addressed. In each chapter the author attempts to expand on specific mystical, poetic, or political themes in individual dialogues that have not previously received enough treatment. For example, Leon Craig elaborates on the politic elements of Plato's Meno, a dialogue usually considered a primarily epistemological work. This reinterpretation of Plato tries to overcome some of the recent misuse of Plato by modern and postmodern thinkers that has resulted in Plato being reduced to "a footnote in the works of other philosophers" (p. 1). The authors of Politics, Philosophy, Writing succeed in raising some interesting issues in the dialogues and refuting several prevalent misconceptions as they detail Plato's attention to caring for souls.

Two chapters in this edited volume should be especially interesting to readers of Plato because they address two important debates that cross multiple dialogues. The first, the importance of shame, is discussed in "Shame in the Apology" by Oona Eisenstadt. Eisenstadt describes in detail how Plato's Socrates utilized shame to attempt to instruct his listeners in the Meno and the Apology, and how the two dialogues are connected. She points out how it is in the Meno that we find out why Socrates was brought to trial by one of his accusers, Anytus, because Socrates showed him to be shameless (pp. 44–45).

More importantly, Eisenstadt discusses the importance of shame to understanding the teachings of Socrates. Socrates used shame to overcome the half-truths and misconceptions of his audience by shaming them into realizing how their assumptions were unjust. The shameless, like Anytus, are unchanged, since they cannot be shamed (p. 46). What remained is resentment without improvement, leading to hatred of Socrates. Her discussion demonstrating the use of shame is critical to interpreting Plato because of the political importance of honor and dishonor. For Plato and Aristotle (see the Republic and the Nicomachean Ethics, respectively), honors are critical tools for the statesman to instruct and alter behavior to improve the soul. Modern thinkers tend to downplay the importance of honors, as individualism has eroded the close connections of the Greek community. Where honors were emphasized, such as in the former Soviet Union, the assumption by Western thinkers usually was that material incentives would always be more influential. One exception comes from the theory of civil disobedience. Martin Luther King, Jr., in his Letter from a Birmingham Jail, discussed how shame must be used to confront moderate America and force it to reexamine the injustice of American laws. It is interesting that he attributed this method to Socrates and compared himself to Socrates. Shame is a tool for politicians and philosophers.

This analysis could help to explain a passage of Plato's Republic that is often much debated. Toward the end of the confrontation between Socrates and Thrasymachus, Socrates remarked about Thrasymachus blushing for the first time he had ever seen (Desmond Lee, trans., 1987, p. 36). This blush could indicate that Thrasymachus felt shame for the first time. He was a sophist, one of the great enemies of Plato's philosophy, and it was unlikely that he ever really considered the justice of his positions. When backed into a corner in the Republic by Socrates he was forced to acknowledge the problems with his expressed views on justice. Perhaps his first-ever display of shame may indicate that for the first time Socrates had succeeded in getting him to question his unjust "convictions." Of course, being the type of man he was, Thrasymachus responded by resentfully withdrawing, not by learning from his shame. At least he was not completely shameless like Socrates' accusers in the Apology. Eisenstadt does not discuss this part of the Republic in connection with her chapter. It would be interesting to see whether she would agree with this proposition.

Eisenstadt also formulates an interesting hypothesis about why Socrates was convicted based on his use of shame. She argues that he relied on shaming the dicasts by appealing to their sense of justice. He could not reach the shameless or the followers of Unjust Speech, but he hoped that he could convince the followers of Just Speech that he was no atheist or sophist (p. 56). He was convicted and judged to die because he failed to convince enough of them through shame and instruction.

"Homeric Imagery in Plato's Phaedrus," by Zdravko Planinc, introduces another interesting topic, the connections between Plato's dialogues and Homer's Odyssey. According to Planine, the Phaedrus is intentionally structured to resemble Homer's work, and several other dialogues are also meant to reflect Homer (p. 124). This is interesting because of the animosity that exists between philosophy and poetry in the Republic. Poets are forced out of the just city, and it is clear that education in poetry interferes with instruction in philosophy (Republic, Part Three). However, Socrates repeatedly used references to Homer and other poets to support his assertions in that work. This could indicate that Socrates and Plato were aware that it is important to appeal to the materials with which their listeners are most familiar. Whatever the reason, Planinc's discussion brings earlier assumptions about the relationship between philosophy and poetry into question since Plato utilized such a format.

The other chapters in this volume include discussions of the mystical elements of Plato in the Republic and the Seventh Letter and elaboration on soulcraft in the Charmides. The subjects and perspectives presented in this volume succeed in stimulating further interest in the dialogues of Plato, as demonstrated above. There are other issues that need to be addressed in relation to each of these topics, especially regarding how they relate to the other works of Plato and other thinkers such as Aristotle, but that is often not the intent of an edited volume. The authors do succeed here in showing that Plato needs to be reexamined to save him from recent misconceptions and misuse.

The Political Philosophy of James Madison. By Garrett Ward Sheldon. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2001. 143p. $32.00.

Franklin A. Kalinowski, Warren Wilson College

Interpreting the entire body of work of a political theorist as prolific as James Madison is a dicey matter. Perhaps more than any other American of his intellectual stature, James Madison can be viewed as shifting ideological positions throughout his long and active life. Reputable scholars such as Marvin Meyers (1973), in his Introduction to The Mind of the Founder, Ralph Ketcham (1971), in James Madison: A Biography, and Douglas Jaenicke's ("Madison vs Madison: The Party Essays v. The Federalist Papers"), in Maidment and Zvesper's (1989) Reflections on the Constitution, have argued with some effectiveness that it is difficult to garner a consistent set of philosophical positions throughout Madison's life. Other scholars, however, such as Lance Banning (1995), in The Sacred Fire of Liberty, Drew McCoy (1980), in The Elusive Republic, and Richard Matthews (1995), in If Men Were Angels, make a case for a more consistent Madison who, although altering positions on specifics, remained remarkably dedicated to a set of core philosophical positions.

In his latest book, The Political Philosophy of James Madison, Garrett Ward Sheldon combines these positions. Drawing on the recent debate over classical republican and liberal traditions, Sheldon argues that Madison went from liberalism to republicanism and back to liberalism again as the historical situation changed. Throughout these shifts, however, Sheldon sees a consistent philosophical underpinning. According to Sheldon, the political philosophy of James Madison exhibits an unswerving dedication to the premises of Calvinist theology, with its assumptions of human depravity, sin, quarrelsomeness, pride, and envy. Sheldon argues that this fundamental Calvinism, learned during Madison's days at Princeton under the tutelage of John Witherspoon, "displayed a cerebral, intellectual Christianity that did not divorce reason from faith but saw the two working together in complementarity for the greater glory of God (p. 2). Indeed, Sheldon's Madison becomes something of an early American version of Jerry Falwell or Pat Robertson: single-mindedly focused on helping humanity struggle against sin, defining "sin" as opposition to his policies, and manipulating the political system to further his theological agenda. Not that Sheldon gives this interpretation of Madison's thought any negative connotation. On the contrary, Sheldon leaves little doubt that he finds this blending of political theory and religious bias both historically accurate and philosophically appealing. More than a few readers will find it neither.

Sheldon takes a perfectly reasonable proposition—there are links between Calvinist assumptions regarding human "depravity" and liberalism's premise that humans are self-interested and conflictual—and extends it far beyond what logic or the evidence will support. While cultural connections between the two most likely exist, one need not be a fundamentalist Calvinist to be a liberal, and there is abundant proof that Madison held positions exactly opposite to those Sheldon advocates. Sheldon associates Witherspoon and Princeton with extreme examples of the eighteenth-century irrational "New Light" theology and then assumes that, since Madison studied at Princeton with Witherspoon, he adopted these views (even while admitting that "during his years in government service Madison never explicitly mentions his personal beliefs" [p. xvi]). During this hyperbole, Sheldon often uses Biblical citations (none of which can be linked to Madison's political thought) and engages in crude proselytizing that many readers will find intellectually offensive, for example, "Emphasizing the spiritual New Birth that Jesus told Nicodemus was necessary to enter the Kingdom of Heaven (John 3:5-8), this move to the Holy Spirit across America, like that in the Biblical account of Pentecost (Acts 2:3-13), upset many staid religious leaders who preferred highly order, rational worship and experience ... [C]onservative 'Old Lights' like Harvard College rejected the evangelical "enthusiasm" and emotion of this move of the Spirit (and eventually rejected the Spirit of Christ altogether by becoming predominantly Unitarian, highly intellectual, and sophisticated); lively 'New Lights' welcomed the conviction of sin, sincere repentance, comfort of the Holy Spirit, and the personal commitment to Christ..." (pp. 6-7).

The handling of Madison's argument for religious disestablishment in the "Memorial and Remonstrance Against Religious Assessments" is revealing of Sheldon's distorted thesis. Most analysts hold that Madison distrusted all factions that inflamed the passions, fearing that religious emotion, in particular, led to social instability since it tended toward extremism and intolerance and was not susceptible to resolution by rational argument. Hence, Madison sought to exclude religion from the political sphere. This, at least, is the argument put forth by scholars such as David Epstein (The Political Theory of the Federalist, 1984). According to Sheldon, however, Madison's intentions were exactly opposite. He contends that Madison believed that the established Anglican Church in Virginia had become "lax and decadent" as well as "cold and lifeless" (p. 28). What Madison wanted, says Sheldon, was to free Virginian religion from the influence of dull, rational Anglicans and open it to "those evangelical churches that faithfully taught Christ" (p. 29). Madison wanted Virginian society to experience more sectarian passion, more self-righteous emotion, and more "vital, faithful churches which strive to carry on the work of the gospel and evangelists" (p. 29). It would help if Sheldon produced some shred of evidence to support what many Madison scholars will consider an absurd argument, but no such evidence is forthcoming (probably because it does not exist). James Madison, no doubt, had his share of human faults, but it is difficult to believe that Christian fanaticism was among them.

This bizarre thesis might be considered innovative and interesting if it were supported with some solid research, but unfortunately, the other crippling weakness of The Political Philosophy of James Madison is its dearth of substantial scholarship. Sheldon's discussion of liberalism and classical republicanism is particularly thin and uninformed. He equates liberalism with the most simplistic form of Lockean thought, ignores the equally important Scottish strain of interest-group liberalism, and displays no acquaintance with the considerable work of such noted scholars as Albert Hirschman, Morton White, Garry Wills, Jack Rakove, Forrest MacDonald, or the legendary Douglass Adair. While it is unfair to criticize a book for not being the one the reviewer would have written, it is entirely proper to expect an author to display a familiarity with the literature on the subject. Instead, Sheldon gives us the briefest rehash of Merrill Peterson's (1974) James Madison: A Biography in His Own Words and Ralph Ketcham's (1990) James Madison (over half the endnotes are to these two sources), and while these are fine studies, much more has been written concerning Madison's thought. Richard Matthew's (1995) If Men Were Angels: James Madison and the Heartless Empire of Reason, with its extensive documentation and tightly reasoned logic remains, by far, the best source on Madisonian thought. Readers familiar with Garrett Ward Sheldon's (1993) earlier The Political Philosophy of Thomas Jefferson will find this latest project immensely disappointing. It is not the intention of this review to be mean spirited, but the sad truth is that of the many books on James Madison, this is the one that least deserves to be read.

Conscious Acts and the Politics of Social Change: Feminist Approaches to Social Movements, Community and Power. Edited by Robin L. Teske and Mary Ann Tétreault. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2000. 320p. $34.95.

Valerie Sperling, Clark University

Rarely does a political science book undertake the simultaneous task of contributing to both scholarship and activism. This edited volume explores the theory and practice of social movements, examining "success" stories, such as the struggle for women's suffrage in the United States, as well as "failures," embodied in this case by an ill-conceived attempt to carry out a charity program in early 1990s Russia. This lens on the lived realities of activism makes it an instructive and unusual book. The volume also discusses how feminist theory and practices influence social movements and power relations. The explicit intention of the editors is to contribute to theory-building, as well as to help design more effective activism. To that end, the contributors include social change activists as well as academics, several of whom combine both identities.

The well-written introductory chapter discusses several concepts to which all the chapters in the book are, in one way or another, tied: feminism, power, civil society, social movements, and community. Although each chapter brings its own interesting perspective to the volume, the volume's coherence might have been improved had the editors pushed their contributors to tie their chapters to these central concepts more closely and explicitly.

At the outset, the editors pose a number of thoughtprovoking questions surrounding the interaction of gender and social movements. These include, Do social movements differ from each other when the activists in them are predominantly male or female? and Why do feminism and nonviolence seem to go together? They also seek to explore the concept of "interests" beyond the liberal conception of selfinterest. They raise questions about community, and how or whether self-interest, differences, and power differentials between people can be overcome. In the volume, these issues are taken up in part in a few theoretically and philosophically oriented chapters exploring the spaces "in between" people—in other words, the realm of human interaction that comprises politics, economics, and nearly the entirely of societal life. These spaces are often filled by relationships of hierarchy and domination, where miscommunication and manipulation are rampant. Can such spaces be converted through the application of agape, one of the Greek concepts of love, and nonviolence? Such are the far-ranging questions raised by this volume.

The book is divided into two parts. Part I contains six chapters, largely concerning social change at the theoretical level. These somewhat disparate chapters range from theoretical analysis of social movements to the utility of "testimonies" as a means of making marginalized voices available in the study of international relations and globalization. Several chapters in this section problematize boundaries, reconceptualize human interaction, and consider nonviolence as a source of power. The successes of human rights movements in bringing down violent repressive states in Eastern Europe and South Africa are brought in as examples of the latter.

Part II turns to concrete cases of feminist (and not explicitly feminist) social movements and modes of activism. Only some of the case study chapters build on and illustrate or develop the nonviolence issue explicitly, while all are directly or indirectly related to the editors' desire to derive lessons of effective activism from scholarship on that subject. One of these discusses the women's suffrage campaign in the United States and derives from that experience lessons about the later, unsuccessful campaign for the ERA. The next chapter contains an interview with an ERA activist, wherein she provides her response to the scholar's suggestions. The pairing of these two chapters makes for an insightful combination of activism and scholarship in dialogue with each other.

Several of the volume's most successful chapters bring alive women's movement activism in Kuwait, the United States, Russia, and Czechoslovakia. Chapter 8 provides a fascinating history of women's activism in Kuwait, of state cooptation of women's groups, and of state encouragement and sponsorship of divisions among women to its own advantage. It also addresses how changes in political opportunity structure gave certain women's groups differing degrees of voice at different times (such as after the Gulf War, for example). Similarly based on empirical research is Chapter 13, which explores, in lively ethnographic style, the power dynamics between Western and Russian activists engaged in charity work in early 1990s Russia. This chapter illustrates the power relations between the Western leader of the organization and the Russian women who carried out the charity work on the ground. The penultimate chapter concerns the largely unrecognized and uncelebrated activity by women dissidents under communist-ruled Czechoslovakia. There, a Czech activist reveals first-hand stories of how the regime was subverted at the ground level through networks and the type of power that relies on trust rather than dominance. This chapter fleshes out the stories of how "underground" materials were secretly replicated and spread by women taking advantage of traditional gender roles (such as exchanging dissident literature hidden in shopping bags while queuing at stores). This chapter, as well as one on women's activism in Chile, makes the point that "conventional stereotypes" were thus used "for unconventional ends" (p. 274).

One of this volume's main themes concerns the varied types of power. Relying on Marilyn French, Hannah Arendt, Simone Weil, and other theorists, the authors show how nonviolent movements use "power-to" (or mutual empowerment through collective action) instead of striving for "powerover" (the classic understanding of power, where A compels B to do something that B would not otherwise do). Several contributors eloquently link feminism and nonviolence, explaining why a social movement's means and ends must be consistent: If the goal is to eliminate domination and oppression that rests on hierarchies of ostensible superiority and inferiority, then movements must use means that are in keeping with those ends or risk replicating an oppressive system. Several of the case study chapters illustrate the alternative understanding of power. Chapter 12, for instance, describes a Virginia-based grassroots organization called Common Ground, which foments coalitions and, thereby, eschews a classic hierarchical pyramidal structure. Instead, they apply a "wheel" model (with hub, spokes, and rim), illustrating the differences in power dynamics between a hierarchical and a coalition-style organization and the consistency of the latter with the principles of feminism and nonviolence.

While undergraduates would find this book challenging, it would serve well in a graduate course on social movements, providing both theory and wide-ranging examples for discussion and analysis. This is a thought-provoking text whose editors offer a radical vision of the world, one in which domination, discrimination, and hierarchy can be replaced by nonviolence and where revealing the gendered nature of social movement activism provides clues to both how this vision could be accomplished and what pitfalls lie before it on the path.

De Tocqueville. By Cheryl B. Welch. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001. 294p. $21.95.

Joshua Mitchell, Georgetown University

It is a testimony to his greatness as an author that Tocqueville has emerged in a new light with each of the more significant events of the twentieth century: the New Deal, the Cold War, the Post-War years. In the last decade, in particular, American scholars of all political persuasions have seen in Tocqueville a point of departure for their consideration of the rudiments of robust democracy and the associational life it seems to require. Democracy perhaps being the only genuine alternative for the future, American scholars have tried to learn from Tocqueville what might be necessary to make it thrive, in places where the political alternatives have been exhausted and the rhetoric, but not yet the substance, of democracy now prevails. In a race to establish democracy before the rhetoric of democracy becomes a hollow caricature, Tocqueville studies have had an urgency about them that the study of other canonical figures in the history of modern political thought-Hobbes, Locke, Rousseau, etc-simply have not. We shall see, of course, whether the Post-War years were merely a hiatus and whether we more properly live in an Inter-War period, perhaps in perpetuity. We shall see, as well, whether the recent military confrontations in Afghanistan are able to be contained under the category of politics rather than of religion. Whatever the future holds, however, we can be sure that the writings of Tocqueville will not be exhausted by the events whose outlines we cannot yet foresee. Tocqueville had a great deal to say about war and, most readers may be surprised to discover, a few very interesting and provocative things to say about Islam as well. But these matters, as I say, must wait for the future.

Welch's book is not about these future possibilities. Rather, it is a superb account of the political terrain that shaped Tocqueville's thinking, the internal logic of his writings, and the current state of Tocqueville studies. Her book is nuanced and insightful throughout, and considered as a whole, it makes several important contributions to the current debate that warrants attention here.

First, there is the matter of the sort of project in which Tocqueville is involved. Tocqueville has never found a completely comfortable place in political philosophy or political theory, notwithstanding the many fine efforts to educe ideas from his writings that would do so. Political philosophers have yet to make up their minds about Tocqueville's place in the cannon of great writers, as the many efforts to situate him against the backdrop of Aristotle, Augustine, Pascal, Montesquieu, and the American founders, among others, attests. Tocqueville's observation about philosophy, that "there is nothing so infertile as an abstract idea," certainly does not help their case, though it does not wholly argue against it either. Political theorists have been equally frustrated by Tocqueville because it is so difficult to glean a theory of democracy from his work. He uses terms in nuanced and sometimes contradictory ways, which makes operationalizing his ideas difficult, if not impossible. As Welch points out (p. 51), Tocqueville himself never took the time to define what he meant by "liberty." How can democracy be theorized at all if this key idea remains unspecified? In Welch's words, "Tocqueville considers collective rather than individual attitudes, the thoughts of typical people rather than elites, unspoken general assumptions rather than elaborate philosophical theories, and the general structure of beliefs rather than their specific content" (p. 104). This observation helps us understand why Tocqueville was never enamored of the suppositions of political economy, since individual "preferences" cannot explain the larger contours of a culture, and why he never set forth a deterministic theory of history, since what rules a society is never univocal, easily identified, or reducible to formulas.

The second important contribution Welch's book makes is to remind readers about what might be called "the weight of history" (p. 234) in Tocqueville's writings. Oakeshott once said, with some disdain, that "the American cannot help but think of himself as a self-made man." Much of the scholarship on Tocqueville in America, in both political philosophy and political theory, has not given sufficient attention to this burden, perhaps because Oakeshott was right: The weight of history has never much seemed to bother Americans, who are themselves generally optimistic about the future. Only a civilization that looks backward rather than forward is attentive to the weight of history. Americans do not look back. Tocqueville did. American scholarship has tended to focus on the "new beginning" about which Tocqueville writes in his account of the New England Puritans—a thought that preoccupied writers during the Cold War, who sought a way out of the supposed iron logic of Marxism. Marxism could not take hold here, Hartz and others said, because the categories of experience were not feudal, as they were in Europe. Yet the obverse Tocqueville's "new beginning" was the legacy of the durable and perhaps intractable patterns of relations between blacks and whites. (This is Tocqueville's usage, so I invoke it here.) Welch has a keen eye for this matter. My one small quibble would be that while the burden of history seems to be the final word in volume I of Democracy in America, the very first thoughts in volume II move in a contrary direction: The "philosophical method" of the Americans, Tocqueville says, abrades all things inherited and ancient. Indeed, one way to understand both volumes as a whole is as a gloss on the question, "Which is more powerful, the atavisms of history, or what could be called a sort of 'logic of equality' through which all inheritances are overthrown and only abstract universals prevail?" If the latter eventually dominate, then indeed the burden of history would be lifted, and Tocqueville's assessment of the intractability of race relations would give way to a more benign arrangement, in which race was trumped by universal rights and equality under national—not local law. This is, as I say, a minor quibble, which is not meant to diminish the importance of Welch's insights into Tocqueville's thinking about the burden of history.

The third contribution made by this book is its recognition of the importance of mood in Tocqueville's writings. Tocqueville, as I said, was not much enamored by philosophy. Neither is he a social scientist, or a moralist. Yet, as Welch says, "Tocqueville's particular combination of sociological, historical, and moral insight has played a unique role in uncovering certain fault lines in contemporary democratic life" (p. 218). Moments of penetrating insight in Tocqueville's writing have this luminous and sometimes maddening quality about them, which blurs the line among social science, prophecy, and confession. Tocqueville scholarship has not paid enough attention to this aspect of his writing, in no small part because the perceived task has been to excise from this unified whole coherent ideas that suit the purpose of one or another narrow investigative community. Welch resists this temptation, and the result is a book that does not try to bend Tocqueville to her own purposes.

American Politics

The Politics of Language in Puerto Rico. By Amilcar Antonio Barreto. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2001. 221p. $55.00.

Steve C. Ropp, University of Wyoming

Puerto Rico has often fallen between the cracks of the subfloor that undergirds not only the study of American politics but also the field of political science in general. Although it has certain nation state-like properties, the fact that it is not a nation state de jure means that those who study international and inter-American relations have given it little attention. This also holds true for Latin American comparativists, who treat it as one of the many small and nonindependent territories that dot the Caribbean. If it had been incorporated into the federal structure of the United States, it would be studied by those within the field of American government who focus on comparative state politics. But its special status as a semiautonomous commonwealth prevents this from happening.

The primary goal in this book is to explain a puzzle relating to a 1991 decision that briefly made the commonwealth a "Spanish only" territory. Puerto Rico had been officially bilingual (Spanish and English) since 1902, following the Spanish-American-Cuban War. Although there had long been efforts by adherents of the separatist Puerto Rican Independence Party (PIP) to promote a "Spanish only" policy, they had never before had much success. This was due to a combination of factors including resistance to such change by the leadership of the commonwealth-backing Popular Democratic Party (PPD) and the statehood-backing New Progressive Party (PNP). Moreover, public opinion polls indicated that a majority of supporters of all three major parties supported the continuation of official bilingualism.

How, then, is one to explain the fact that the Puerto Rican legislature passed "The Official Language Act of 1991" and that it was subsequently signed into law by Governor Rafael Hernandez Colon of the dominant and centrist PPD? The general unpopularity of this measure is attested to by the fact the PPD and it candidates (including Governor Hernandez Colon) were severely punished in the next election, and the Language Act was subsequently repealed.

Barreto attempts to solve this puzzle by using a somewhat modified version of Anthony Down's classic vote maximization model to appeal to voting constituencies. While it at first seems puzzling from a Downsian rational actor perspective that the PPD would "irrationally" support a language bill that would risk alienating not only its own constituents but also potential defectors from the PIP and PNP, Barreto sees a second level of rationality at work. He believes that the PPD was involved in a two-level game in which Spanish language preservation was such a cherished goal for the Puerto Rican "culture state" that a higher rationality overruled normal electoral expediency. Here, Barreto relies in part on George Tsebelis' (Nested Games: Rational Choice in Comparative Politics, 1990) nested games approach as it has been applied to solve puzzles associated with seemingly irrational patterns of legislative cooperation in consociational European democracies.

A major strength of this book is that Barreto grounds his analysis of Puerto Rican politics in the work of a highly respected scholar and student of American politics. Since Downs first wrote his seminal An Economic Theory of Democracy (1957) close to half a century ago, the debate among those who study American legislative behavior has been not so much about the merits of the rational choice approach but rather about how various differences in institutional structures influence and affect legislative outcomes. Thus, by using such a mainstream approach to study political behavior in Puerto Rico, Barreto's book helps to bridge the gap between comparativists, who would attempt to understand commonwealth politics through the use of theories that stress factors such as dependency, ethnicity, and cultural nationalism, and the broad community of students of American politics.

At the same time, this use of Down's rational choice theoretical framework to solve this particular puzzle seems to place rather severe limits on the range of alternative explanations for passage of the Official Language Act that Barreto might otherwise have considered. For example, the very fact that the preservation of a Spanish linguistic heritage became such a "vital objective" and "cherished goal" that it required a second and higher level of rational action begs the question of why this might have been the case. From a constructivist perspective (what I want and thus rationally attempt to get depends on who I consider myself to be), this apparently irrational act might be explained in terms of individual and/or collective shifts in the Puerto Rican sense of identity. Indeed, there is much evidence in recent studies such as those by anthropologist Arlene Davila (Sponsored Identities: Cultural Politics in Puerto Rico, 1997) that Puerto Rican identity was being radically transformed during the 1970s and 1980s through various forms of party and corporate related cultural activity. Such a radical transformation of national identity could have hypothetically then been "externalized" in the form of new kinds of voting behavior such as that which made the Official Language Act of 1991 possible.

Fundamentally, Barreto views the PPD leadership (and, for that matter, the leadership of Puerto Rico's two other major political parties) as using language and other identity-related issues as tools to achieve rationally calculated goals related to vote maximization. Those who study the politics of identity sometimes call such usage "strategic essentialism"—the deployment by leaders of symbols of identity as part of a broader rational (and sometimes cynical) calculus aimed at maximizing leadership goals, whatever these goals might be. It is unfortunate that Barreto did not choose to explore some alternative avenues of explanation, particularly those that relate to values and associated identities as causally consequential in their own right.

Barreto's book is a welcome addition to the literature on American politics not only because it takes the long-dominant Downsian approach to the study of legislative action seriously but also because it broadens the debate concerning what Puerto Rico is actually all about. While there are many excellent books that treat it as fundamentally a social and cultural entity (el estado jibaro), this book suggests that we should treat it as a normal American state with a few special historical characteristics.

Olympic Dreams: The Impact of Mega-Events on Local Politics. By Matthew J. Burbank, Gregory D. Andranovich, and Charles H. Heying. Boulder: Lynne Rienner, 2001. 203p. $49.95 cloth, $19.95 paper.

Michael A. Pagano, University of Illinois at Chicago

Cities' pursuit of economic development activities sits at the interstices of the economic marketplace and political power. Private-sector investment is not realized in a power vacuum; political institutional and politicians' behavior influence, alter, and in many ways determine the kind and location of those private investment decisions. It is no wonder, then, that both economists and political scientists have much to say about the efficiency, effectiveness, equity, and impact of urban economic development. And it is no wonder that volumes have been written on the vast array of urban development projects from a comparative or idiosyncratic perspective. Attracting the quadrennial Olympic games is no exception. Matthew Burbank, Gregory Andranovich, and Charles Heying have performed an impressive task of compiling documents and accounts on the politics and economics surrounding the successful efforts of Los Angeles, Atlanta, and Salt Lake City in luring the Olympics to their cities and regions.

They begin their account with a lengthy review of the theoretical and empirical literature on cities, urban development, and regime politics. They argue that declining federal aid in the early 1980s and global competition for businesses have meant that cities were pushed to compete on a world stage, that they had become more entrepreneurial in a "postfederal" environment, and that they chose aggressive economic development strategies. Further, the authors argue that cities with strong growth regimes and an interest in creating an image of their city were characteristic of these three cities' pursuit of the Olympic games, an economic development project they refer to as the "mega-event strategy." Case studies on each of the three cities are presented serially and are informed by a wealth of secondary sources, from journalistic accounts of the bidding, negotiating, and unfolding of the games to feasibility and postgame studies by city agencies and scholars. Each case is carefully described, the motivations and behavior of key actors and institutions are explored in detail, and lengthy discussions of winners and losers in the siting and financing of the games are presented. They conclude that image-building and revenue generation are important motivations to hosting the Olympic games, but they also contend that mega-events "establish a pattern of treating the city as a commodity" (p. 161). Their argument, then, is that the commodification of the city ignores the people who live there. A mega-event, they conclude, "serves only narrow purposes" (p. 171).

The strength of the narrative about three cities and their pursuit of the dream of hosting the Olympics is that they put a political and corporate face on the nonathletic side of the games. Their study places city governments and private-sector investors in the broader picture of development projects, even if the Olympics are on a grander or what some might call an extreme scale. The limitations of the study inhere in its reliance on secondary sources and its most similar-city design. Instructive to our understanding of the political and economic dimensions of hosting the Olympic games would be a comparative assessment of those cities that failed to attract the games. The authors provide some information about the failure of Denver and Seattle in bidding on or attracting the games, even though those cities appear to have the same needs and criteria of the successful cities (growth regime, image creation, loss of federal funds, global linkages). Do "failed" cities ignore the people who live there? Do the "narrow purposes" of hosting a mega-event transcend Olympic cities, or are these outcomes peculiar to the successful cities only? The evidence from a similar-cities research design raises many questions for future research. As it is, however, the three cases establish a useful baseline of comparison for future work.

Rethinking Democratic Accountability. By Robert D. Behn. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press, 2001. 317p. $41.95 cloth, $16.95 paper.

Peter Kobrak, Western Michigan University

Everybody seems to talk about accountability but no one ever does anything about it, Robert Behn argues in this thought-provoking book. This is scarcely due to a lack of enough overseers. Behn rattles off the innumerable "accountability holders"—including the GAO, lawyers, journalists, and inspectors general—who dish it out while the wretched public administrators take it. These accountability adversaries exclusively pursue either accountability for finances or accountability for fairness, doling out punishments where rules are inadequately met and feeling no obligation to consider those performance considerations that may have driven managerial choices. Public managers may be confronted by an "accountability dilemma" in pondering the trade-offs between finances and fairness and performance, but that is not the accountability holder's problem.

Behn supplies an even-handed discussion of why the "traditional public administration paradigm," with its concern about corruption and laws governing finances and fairness, evolved, along with a balanced, though critical, explanation of the work of Max Weber, Frederick W. Taylor, and James Q. Wilson and their accountability holder progeny. Furthermore, even as a supporter of the new public management and its emphasis on a "culture of performance," Behn concedes that the paradigm requires its own theory of democratic accountability.

While fuzzy about just what accountability is, Behn is clear on what question a performance-based paradigm must answer: "How will we hold whom accountable for what?" It is fine for new public management paradigm supporters to say that agencies should be held accountable for results, but that is hardly enough. Who decides what results? Behn answers that elected officials, political appointees, members of the accountability establishment, and, yes, citizens too must consider "how empowered, entrepreneurial, responsive civil services can make innovative decisions in a decentralized yet democratic government" (p. 64).

The problem is that most of the existing mechanisms evaluate administrative fairness or financial irregularities rather than performance, which, as Behn reminds us, is the fundamental purpose of administrative agencies. The solution must be some form of "collaborative accountability"—where accountability is not merely hierarchical or focused on one organization but instead engages all of the relevant stakeholders in mutual and balanced evaluation of not only finances and fairness but also performance. Rather than relying on an overabundance of rules to anticipate violations in finance and fairness before they occur, such collaborative accountability would evaluate retrospectly whether public entrepreneurs achieved their goals and consequently should be allowed more discretion and trust. Indeed, the "accountability catch" is that without such discretion, there can be no real accountability. James Madison and William Proxmire notwithstanding, a "culture of mistrust" creates a "fear of discretion" that permeates the world of Congress and the overhead regulators. While there then must be some tradeoff between discretion and accountability, Behn joins Ronald Reagan in proposing that we must "trust but verify."

If public agencies are "to convince the citizens that government performance is not an oxymoron" (p. 119), stakeholders concerned with performance must form a "new compact of mutual, collective responsibility." Those public managers, citizens, and accountability holders willing to weigh fairness, finance, and performance must voluntarily join in making an informal ethical commitment to accept responsibility for the pursuit of democratic accountability. Everyone in the accountability environment thus assumes some responsibility for agency performance.

Behn works hard to show that this "cooperation challenge" can be met. He supplies successful case studies and even draws on advanced versions of the prisoner's dilemma and the tragedy of the commons to overcome the problem of collective action. He also feels that such cooperation can be fostered through altering professional norms and public expectations. The cooperation challenge must be met by enforcing the necessary reciprocity.

One product of such a mutual compact could be a "charter agency" that would accept additional accountability for performance in exchange for fewer rules and other constraints on its efforts to comply with finances and fairness. Such agencies would not be created but rather would evolve over time. Volunteers among the stakeholders would initially enter into such compacts and then gradually seek to expand their membership through incremental performance achievements.

In concluding his argument, Behn takes the high ground by distinguishing between accountability as merely answerability to justify actions and responsibility as "the moral obligation to work collectively with public employees, collaborators from nonprofit and for-profit organizations, and citizens in pursuit of the public interest" (p. 196). Such responsibility requires "360-degree evaluation" akin to those corporate efforts to evaluate personnel by seeking the views not only of superiors but also of subordinates, peers, and other internal and external stakeholders. Such multiple perspectives provide a more accurate view of performance and stand in contrast to the "360-degree harassment" that too often today masquerades as accountability. Such 360-degree accountability holds out the potential to engage citizens actively in goal setting and evaluation. It can thus enlarge citizen trust through informed consent and produce "institutions motivated less by personal, self-interest than by our mutual, collective public interest" (p. 217).

The book requires considerable optimism in that democratic accountability assumes that numerous individual and institutional actors will do the right thing. The discussion of Congressional professional norms depends heavily on Donald Matthews' 1960 discussion of the folkways of the Senate and neglects the more recent literature that shows a decline in such Congressional professional norms. Behn's reliance on the public interest in making his case is unusual for a new public management advocate and requires more than a limited discussion in the Notes. And his interchangeable discussion of charter schools and charter agencies is curious in that the charter schools rely on an end run around rules governing finances and fairness, while charter agencies would presumably seek a creative tension among finances, fairness, and performance.

Behn, however, provides in Rethinking Democratic Accountability a well-reasoned and original contribution. His lively writing, balanced assessment, and ambitious recommendations are rare in the well-plowed field of accountability literature. The book would be suitable for advanced undergraduate and graduate seminars in public administration, American politics, and organization theory.

In making a vigorous case for mutual and collective accountability, Behn moves the accountability debate to a new level. The approach is well calculated to stimulate debate at a time when the nation appears to be serious about a change in strengthening government capacity.

Mediated Politics: Communication in the Future of Democracy. Edited by W. Lance Bennett and Robert M. Entman. Cambridge University Press, 2001. 489p. $74.95 cloth, $29.95 paper.

Tali Mendelberg, Princeton University

Nothing energizes a field of study more than a revolution. The explosion of new forms of mass communication is just such a revolution for the field of political communication, to judge by this volume. As its 22 chapters demonstrate, profound changes in the technology and institutions of mass media have prompted a wide-ranging and stimulating effort to document, interpret, and theorize.

The volume demonstrates like no other that the changes in communication technology and in the media industry over the past 15 years have been great in number and in kind. On the technology front we have witnessed the sharply increasing availability and use of cable and satellite television, with their explosion of channels; the proliferation of VCRs and devices that allow people to select what they wish and ignore all else; and Internet communication, which allows people to connect with either like-minded or foreign strangers in virtual communities or opinion forums, offering people the chance to disconnect from their immediate surroundings. Media businesses too operate differently in kind from what they were doing 20 years ago: They are conglomerating more and competing less; they target finely segmented audiences at the expense of unifying citizens; they treat audiences as simple-minded consumers to be entertained with sordid scandal, campaign horse-race coverage, or speculative melodrama rather than as educable citizens to be neutrally and fully informed and politically empowered; they are increasingly blurring the lines between the genre of news and that of entertainment; and they ignore federal guidelines meant to ensure fair access on matters of public concern. A revolution, it would seem, has arrived.

This revolution demands answers to a host of important questions: Does the new technology affect citizens' engagement in politics? Are the quantity and quality of information available to citizens truly different than before? Is the public indeed more Balkanized than before, and have people's social allegiances and civic sensibilities really eroded? Are market forces dissolving the glue that binds individuals into a public? Have traditional sources such as local newspapers survived? Has inequality between social and informational classes been exacerbated or remedied? What does all this portend for the health of democracy, and what standards should we use in determining the prognosis? Lending greater urgency to these questions is the possibility that the answers can shed light on what appear as concomitant trends in citizen politics: a decline in nationalism in postindustrial societies; growing cynicism and distrust of government; and, more controversially, falling voter turnout rates. (Some point to an erosion of partisanship, but recent work shows otherwise. See Larry M. Bartels. "Partisanship and Voting Behavior, 1952-1996." American Journal of Political Science 44 [2000]: 35-50; Marc Hetherington. "Resurgent Mass Partisanship: The Role of Elite Polarization." American Political Science Review 95 [2001] 619-32; John Zaller, in reviewed volume.)

to puzzle over these questions. The ambitious introductory chapter lays out general themes that go some way toward binding the chapters into a coherent whole. The book then proceeds in several parts, from general essays on the interplay of mass communication and public affairs, to examinations of new and old institutions of mass communication, to systematic studies of the intersection of mass communication with public opinion, to a focus on political campaigns.

Common to many of the chapters is a sense that political communication should be civic-minded rather than market-driven. The concept of the public sphere plays a prominent role here. In the ideal construction of theorists such as Habermas, the public sphere is the set of informal gathering places in which free conversation thrives. This mutual exchange is in turn expected to help citizens to understand their common goals and to motivate and enable them to participate in public affairs. Pear Dahlgren and Colin Sparks provide useful discussions of the concept and then apply its normative standards to the case of the Internet, with mixed conclusions. Underwood argues against the widely held claim that news outlets seeking profit must treat audiences as customers rather than citizens.

These and similar chapters (such as that by Don Slater) illustrate a strength and a weakness of much of the volume. While they pose questions central to democracy and seek to understand important new trends, the conclusions often rest on less than robust evidence. To be sure, some chapters stand on much stronger ground than others. Michael Delli Carpini and Bryce Williams, for example, offer a compelling analysis of the blurring lines between news and entertainment. Kathleen Jamieson engages in a detailed analysis of the content of issue-advocacy ads, a phenomenon of the 1990s designed to circumvent spending limits. While explicitly avoiding candidate advocacy as required, many ads implicitly violate important deliberative requirements. Several other chapters, however, testify to the need to analyze more and better evidence about how people actually communicate in the public sphere and how communication actually affects citizens.

There is a productive tension in the volume between the pessimism of many chapters and optimism, the minority view. Pessimists tend to believe that contemporary democracies do not allow enough public participation or influence. Elites, increasingly abetted by the media, have latitude in a representative system and can ignore many types of public opinion. The new media trends exacerbate social inequalities, further limiting citizen influence. Increasingly sensationalist or commercialized news coverage fosters political ignorance or quiescence. Often, pessimists predict a great impact on politics from the massive changes in communication.

Optimists are not as wedded to a civic conception of democracy. They worry less that people may not participate heavily in politics, that discourse may be uncivil, that the public will may go unheeded, or that some citizens have less say than others. Often, optimists argue that the changes are less than they seem or carry few consequences.

Among the pessimists are Entman and Susan Herbst, who provide an original and vigorous challenge to the way scholars conceptualize the public opinion, with important implications for our understanding of the media and democratic governance. While others no doubt will challenge the empirical analysis of defense spending presented here (e.g., Larry M. Bartels. "Constituency Opinion and Congressional Policy Making: The Reagan Defense Build Up." American Political Science Review 85 [1991]: 457–74), any student of public opinion will have to grapple with the argument. Bennett and Entman as well as oscar Gandy worry about the gap between "the electronic haves and have nots" (p. 19). Gadi Wolfsfeld's pessimism is born of his fascinating study of waves of news coverage, with their sudden, confusing dissipation. Doris Graber argues that young people are the most politically disengaged, that today's youth are more different from their elders than were previous young generations from theirs. However, according to the evidence, there may not be a bigger generational gap for today's young people (Table 20.1). Rather, there seems to be a long-term disengagement that has affected several cohorts, and if anything, the oldest generation appears distinctive (Tables 20.2 and 20.3). Thus the pessimists tend to offer provocative and original frameworks, although the empirical analysis is sometimes not as persuasive as it might be.

Among the optimists is Timothy Cook, whose distinctive argument, developed elsewhere and persuasively presented in chapter 9, is that despite the many changes, the media continues to function as always. The media has never served the citizenry primarily. Rather, the media is used by and serves the needs of elites John Zaller's systematic argument, with attendant evidence, convinces that even the highly sensationalist coverage of the Clinton-Lewinsky scandal need not-and perhaps cannot—alter the public's criteria for evaluating the president. Partisanship and the president's performance on the basics—the nation's pocketbook and its physical safety govern the public will even in the face of sensationalism. Rodevick Hart offers a multifacted look at letters to the editor, with data on thousands of letter-writers and on editorial decisions and readers' perception about them. The study is on the optimistic side, showing no across-the-board decline toward political apathy (Table 19.2).

So which is the more accurate way to characterize the media trends and their consequence: revolutionary change or seamless continuity? And does political communication enable democracy to work effectively, or do the flaws fail to pass a critical threshold? The evidence so far is with continuity and democratic health. But that may be due not so much to a closer fit with reality as to the disadvantage of advocates of the change thesis in conducting systematic empirical analysis.

In any case, perhaps the dichotomy is a bit too simple. A notable chapter that does not fit the dichotomy and in some ways benefits from it is William Gamson's, in which he summarizes his extensive empirical work on media frames. Gamson finds that some issues generate media frames that, by highlighting citizens' agency, promote the kind of collective action lauded by participatory theorists. Under some conditions pessimism is warranted; under others, optimism is. An interesting question provoked by this study is whether agency really comes from the nature of the issue or instead is heavily influenced by the tactics and alliances of activists.

Also stepping outside the dichotomy are Wendy Rahn and Thomas Rudolph. They argue—with persuasive survey evidence—that young people are less attached than older people to national identity and politics in part because of trends in communication. The Internet acts as a globalizing force that erodes citizens' identity with the nation-state and engagement with its political system, though the consequences need not be negative if a supranational organization (the European Union) is on the rise.

This volume proves that questions about audience segmentation, use of the Internet, and the merger of entertainment and news not only shed light on the nature of media change but also prompt us to revisit the meaning of basic democratic requirements. While one hopes to see more systematic analysis in future work, this volume is notable for the big and worthy questions it tackles. Much useful theorizing awaits the reader.

The Debate over Slavery: Antislavery and Proslavery Liberalism in Antebellum America. By David F. Ericson. New York: New York University Press, 2000. 216p. $55.00 cloth, $19.00 paper.

Democracy and Slavery in Frontier Illinois: The Bottomland Republic. By James Simeone. Dekalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 2000. 290p. $38.00.

Manisha Sinha, University of Massachusetts, Amherst

Both the books under review deal with the development of a distinctly American political tradition of liberalism and liberal democracy and its relationship to the thorny issue of racial slavery. However, the authors employ very different means to explore this common goal. While David Ericson, as in his previous work, concentrates on the level of national politics, James Simeone examines the local political culture of "bottomland republicanism" in early Illinois.

In his book, Ericson seeks to revive Louis Hartz's "liberal consensus thesis" or the idea that ideological consensus rather than conflict marks American history by exploring its "toughest [test] case" (p. 8), the sectional conflict over slavery and the Civil War. According to him, antislavery and proslavery advocates, despite their differences on slavery, shared an underlying belief in liberalism. In bringing the Old South's defenders of slavery under the umbrella of liberalism, he goes further than Hartz himself, who had dismissed the South's reactionary defense of slavery as a short-lived feudal dream. Interestingly enough, he presents us with a far closer, textual reading of proslavery than of antislavery works. Perhaps the author is well aware of the skepticism that will greet his attempt to portray proslavery ideologues as nineteenth-century American liberals.

Ericson's classification of antislavery and proslavery arguments as deontological, consequentialist, and contextualist is limiting rather than illuminating. Historical arguments are far messier and complicated, as he sometimes seems to acknowledge, than the neat categories social scientists would assign to them. Labeling Lydia Maria Child's abolitionist pamphlet as mainly consequentialist, he fails to do justice to its pioneering antiracism arguments. And while he does discuss the writings and speeches of his subjects ably for the most part, the historical context in which they were uttered is at times lacking. James Henry Hammond's conditional unionism, for instance, was a product of the increasingly pro-Southern Democratic Party's domination of the federal government throughout the 1850s and not due to some primordial loyalty to the Union, which he supposedly shared with Calhoun.

Most problematic is Ericson's attempt to push renowned conservative proslavery thinkers into a liberal straitjacket. His differentiation of liberal, or slavery is the best state of liberty for African Americans, and nonliberal, or African Americans as a race are suited to slavery, proslavery arguments is not very convincing. Both arguments in fact are decidedly racist. In their open celebration of social hierarchy and stability and denunciation of the principles of the Declaration of Independence, men such as George Fitzhugh and Hammond sound more like followers of Sir Robert Filmer than Locke. Making a somewhat strange argument, Ericson claims that proslavery thinkers were liberals simply because they believed that slavery was a progressive institution. Nor can we view Calhoun's concurrent majority theory and Southerners' demand for the extension and perpetuity of racial slavery as merely pleas for tolerance and pluralism. Perhaps the one way in which many proslavery thinkers followed classical liberalism was their insistence on the sanctity of human property and their upholding of the slaveholders' right to property over the slaves' right to liberty. Here Ericson misses an opportunity to explore fully how much in common champions of slavery had with bourgeois conservatives outside their section.

Ericson's portrayal of abolitionists as irresponsible, antiinstitutional agitators is decidedly old-fashioned and revisionist in tone. At times, he fails to distinguish sufficiently between the more opportunistic arguments of antislavery politicians and those of abolitionists. To blame abolitionist arguments that allegedly "marginalized the freed slaves" rather than the violent opposition of white southerners to racial equality for "the failure of Reconstruction" (p. 89) is ahistorical and untenable. In his concluding chapter on the Civil War, Ericson, while claiming to develop a synthesis between the revisionist needless conflict school of Civil War historians and those who view the war as inevitable and irrepressible, leans far too much on the revisionist side. For example, he repeatedly characterizes Lincoln's famous house divided speech as a self-fulfilling prophecy rather than a perceptive statement on the sectional conflict and its underlying causes. Somewhat contradictorily, he then tries to enlist Lincoln for his liberal consensus view of the Civil War. But Lincoln viewed the Southern demand for the liberty to hold slaves as political tyranny and the essence of immorality, and not simply as a different version of liberalism.

Like Ericson, Simeone tries to rehabilitate the reputation of the advocates of slavery. If Ericson's proslavery writers were liberals at heart, those who fought for the introduction of slavery in Illinois in 1823-24, according to Simeone, were really champions of democracy. In his book, they emerge as the descendants of an antielitist, backcountry political culture extending back to the Old World. The fight for the introduction of slavery represented a battle between "white folk" and "big folk" such as Edward Coles, a former Virginia slaveholder whose apparently "aggressive antislavery views" (p. 17) offended the plain folks. Simeone explains that many of these white folk were slaveholding yeoman farmers rather than "plantation aristocrats" (p. 24) but slave ownership in antebellum America, as the economist Gavin Wright has pointed out, already put one in the ranks of the wealthy. Most self-working farmers in the mid-west ranked below in capital than a southern farmer who owned even one slave.

The white folk, Simeone argues, fought against the class above them, the race below them, and the "Yankees," Northerners who personified antislavery and promarket forces. The white folk sought to preserve their economic independence and political equality by fighting for democracy in the name of slavery. They led a democratic revolution against men such as Ninian Edwards and Jesse Thomas, who dominated the territorial and state governments of early Illinois. However, as Simeone acknowledges, the white folk themselves were divided over the advisability of introducing slavery into Illinois. Indeed, some of his evidence points to a democratic republican critique of racial slavery. In short, the forces for democracy and slavery were hardly neatly aligned in this state. The author's explanation of the division among white folk over slavery as a cultural cum religious one—"whole hog Calvinists," or strongly democratic and proslavery, versus "milk and cider Arminians," or weakly democratic and antislaveryis less than convincing. He fails to explore the more obvious sectional or North-South division over slavery in Illinois fully, which, as he points out, does presage the sectional conflict of the 1840s and 1850s.

Simeone contends that Illinois' proslavery bottomland farmers were exponents of revolutionary republicanism and precursors of antebellum champions of majoritarian rule and popular sovereignty. They redefined the universalism of revolutionary republicanism in a particularistic fashion and became champions of the white folk in the Jacksonian era. While Jacksonian democracy was indeed a white man's democracy, it was not an explicitly proslavery movement. Rather it was based on a national consensus on slavery and around the economic issues that Western republicans held so dear. Otherwise, the conflict between the staunchly proslavery John C. Calhoun and the champion of the plain folk, Andrew Jackson, would be inexplicable. Perhaps Illinois' advocates of slavery, like Ninian Edwards, were more Calhounite than Jacksonian. Moreover, the author does not explore the final conflict between the Western majoritarian, democratic vision represented by popular sovereignty and slavery during the Kansas wars. Despite his moral insensitivity to the issue of slavery, Stephen Douglas, to whom the author alludes throughout the text, finally had to confront slavery to save the white man's democracy.

Finally, for a book that purports to deal with the politics of slavery and racism, Simeone fails to explore either of these issues in any depth. The fight between the proslavery conventionists and the antislavery nonconventionists in Illinois sounds more like a battle of tin swords. His discussion of bottomland republicanism also tends to obfuscate rather than clarify these issues. All caveats aside, this book is well researched and Simeone is no doubt right in arguing that political development in Illinois foreshadowed Jacksonian democracy and the sectional conflict over slavery in the late antebellum period. He correctly concludes that the axis of political conflict in early America was republicanism and democracy against liberal constitutionalism and institutions but his effort to link proslavery forces with the cause of democracy is questionable. This is especially pertinent when one considers the fact that proslavery advocates in antebellum America relied far more often on formal constitutionalism and a supposed respect for tradition and institutions to make their case than their antislavery opponents.

By attempting to incorporate slavery in a broader liberal or democratic political tradition, Simeone and Ericson fail to deal sufficiently with the political significance of slavery and its impact on the politics of pre-Civil War America. Any account of this period of political history that does not explore how racial slavery affected the ideologies, political processes, and very nature of politics in early America is incomplete.

Corporate Power and the Environment: The Political Economy of U.S. Environmental Policy. By George A. Gonzalez. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2001. 160p. $60.00 cloth, $21.95 paper.

Clyde W. Barrow, University of Massachusetts, Dartmouth

George A. Gonzalez has authored a lucid and well-written book with a sharp thesis. He challenges the conventional claim that environmental policy is "an oasis of democracy" by developing a series of case studies to demonstrate that "members of the nation's economic elite—corporate decision-makers and other individuals of substantial wealth—are the dominant influences in the formation and development of U.S. environmental policies" (p. ix). In constructing his theoretical argument, Gonzalez combines G. William Domhoff's method of power structure analysis with James Weinstein's and others' historical analysis of corporate liberalism.

Gonzalez has selected environmental policy as a "hard case" for promoting the well-deserved and long overdue "rehabilitation" of Domhoff's method of power structure research. He observes that "environmental policies are widely perceived to be arenas where business influence is weakest" (p. 18) in American politics, but Gonzalez deploys a wealth of historical evidence to suggest that these policies are in fact "largely shaped by capitalist elites and generally serve the political and economic interests of corporate America" (p. ix). As controversial and counterintuitive as this may seem, Gonzalez marshals an impressive array of historical evidence. Unlike many political scientists who have turned to history, Gonzalez does not merely rely on extant writings by historians but makes an original historical contribution to the subject by delving into the personal correspondence of key actors, government archives, the proceedings of professional associations, obscure government documents, and archival materials from leading organizations in the policy planning network.

Gonzalez draws on these sources to conduct a relentless and unequivocal polemic against theories of pluralism and state autonomy and, in doing so, provides a unique counterpoint to the conventional wisdom that business interests and environmental policy are necessarily antagonistic interests in the political arena. To illustrate his thesis, Gonzalez selects four environmental policy areas: management of the national forests, management of the national parks, federal wilderness preservation, and federal clean air policies. In successive chapters, Gonzalez analyzes the origins of the U.S. Forest Service, the U.S. Park Service, Redwood National Park, Yosemite National Park, and the Jackson Hole National Monument. His final case study examines the adoption of the Clean Air Act of 1990.

Gonzalez's analysis also builds on the previous work of Murray Edelman by emphasizing that environmental policy has been deployed by political elites as an important symbol of democracy that helps legitimate the state by presenting these policies to the public "as a means to control economic interests and hold corporate powers in check" (p. ix). However, Gonzalez insists that a closer examination of these policies reveals that their implementation has "historically altered the operation of the economy to the benefit of capitalist concerns" (p. ix), while explicitly rejecting alternative, if poorly organized, conceptions of ecological policy.

Within this general theoretical framework, Gonzalez develops a distinct argument in each case study. For example, in his analysis of the origins of the U.S. Forest Service and the national parks system, Gonzalez examines the political conflict between the ideals of scientific forestry (wilderness preservation) championed largely by university professors and the ideals of practical forestry championed by Gifford Pinchot and other corporate liberals. In recounting the triumph of practical forestry, Gonzalez concludes that practical forestry was favored by "an upper-class and corporate-based policy network promoting the use of particular forestry practices in both private and public forests in the United States" (p. 23). However, Gonzalez's argument is not merely a democratic critique of elite dominance. He also uses these case studies to illustrate the significant differences in policy outcomes that result from such dominance.

In the case of practical forestry, Gonzalez not only concludes that corporate interests triumphed in the policy arena, but finds that their policy planning network "intervened directly to mold the profession of forestry into a discipline that served the needs of the U.S. timber industry" (p. x). Thus, when the Redwood National Park was created many decades later, the form in which it was preserved "both accommodated and served the profit goals of the large timber firms involved" in the controversy (p. x), while defeating the plans of serious preservationists. In a similar vein, Gonzalez argues that "in the case of the park service, its centralized management, resources, and professionalism have been historically deployed to convert the national parks into a profit generating system of tourist centers" (p. 45).

Gonzalez's thesis is less sharp in the case of wilderness preservation (e.g., Jackson Hole Monument), where he argues only that "active economic elite political support is a necessary condition" (p. 61) of its adoption, but it is the one case where he cannot link the policy to an unequivocally economic class interest. Similarly, Gonzalez argues that Clean Air Act of 1990 "was the result of industry efforts to create uniformity in clean air regulations" by having the 1990 Clean Air Act stave off and supplant more stringent and costly air pollution regulatory regimes enacted on the state and local level (p. 95). In this instance, the Clean Air Act served to "rationalize air pollution regulations to the benefit of business interests" (p. 95). While its adoption certainly removed the threat of more stringent and costly state and local legislation, it is not clear why such legislation should not be viewed as a "second-best" compromise for business that also defeated it first preference (i.e., no legislation).

Gonzalez has carved out a unique perspective on environmental policy that also has implications for the state theory debate. It is an important contribution to the emerging trend among many new political scientists of returning to works of Domhoff, Miliband, and the corporate liberal historians, while extending that work into new policy areas. It is also part of what some of us hope is a renewed interest in the study of corporate power by political scientists.

The Presidential Difference: Leadership Style from FDR to Clinton. By Fred I. Greenstein. New York: Free Press, 2000. 282p. $25.00.

Nicol C. Rae, Florida International University

The overriding theme of this very insightful work from distinguished presidential scholar Fred I. Greenstein is stated in the opening pages: "The United States is said to have a government of laws and institutions rather than individuals, but as these examples remind us, it is one in which the matter of who occupies the nation's highest office can have profound repercussions" (p. 2). Greenstein's analysis of presidential leadership styles from FDR to Clinton corroborates his theme by demonstrating the extent to which the aggrandizement of the presidency since the New Deal has left the American polity at the mercy of the skills and personalities of the holders of the office. As Greenstein himself points out (p. 3) parliamentary systems, with their more collective leadership, place more partisan and institutional constraints on the head of government. In contrast, the centrality of the presidency to the American system of government since the New Deal and the extent to which the institution is driven by the individual style of respective officeholders provide a recurrent and pervasive element of instability in American national government. Yet this very instability is also perhaps the office's most useful attribute. In a system characterized largely by gridlock it provides intermittent and necessary innovation and dynamism. The presidency's' greatest shortcoming, its highly protean nature, is also, ironically, its greatest value as a political institution.

This should be a highly accessible and informative volume for undergraduate students, scholars of the presidency, and politically interested general readers alike. Having established the extent to which individual personality and leadership style are critical to the modern presidency, Professor Greenstein proceeds to provide the reader with succinct but absorbing sketches of the presidential styles of FDR and his successors. Each president is assessed in terms of what Greenstein sees as the six components of an overall presidential leadership style: "public communicator," "organizational capacity," "political skill," "vision of public policy," "cognitive style," and "emotional intelligence." The great advantage of utilizing such a large number of factors is that it allows for a more nuanced analysis of presidential leadership than the traditional narrow focus on "political bargaining" or "personality." A consistent and rigorous framework of analysis also enables Greenstein to avoid the perennial problem for works on the presidency: the tendency to lapse into simple narrative and anecdote. The recognition of the significance of communication skills and vision to the conduct of the modern presidency also reminds us of the curious nature of an office that demands the political skills of a head of government coupled with the demeanor and bearing of a head of state. Another strength of the book is the background information on each president both in the individual chapters and in the even more useful Appendix, which provides basic but essential information—cabinet members, family biographical information, and significant events—on each officeholder and his administration.

The subtlety and comprehensiveness of Greenstein's framework for analyzing leadership style enable him to reveal shortcomings in the styles of presidents generally regarded as "successful" and, by the same token, the strengths of presidents usually dismissed as utter "failures." Greenstein is critical, for example, of Franklin Roosevelt in one area that most presidential scholars (following Richard Neustadt) have always perceived to be one of Roosevelt's greatest strengths—his organizational practices. According to Greenstein, FDR's vaunted "chaotic organizational methods" were simply "chaotic" and generally got in the way of the objectives of his administration. In contrast, he finds more to admire in the more structured and formal presidential advisory and decision-making practices of Eisenhower and Gerald Ford. Greenstein also gives FDR relatively low marks for cognitive skills and, perhaps more surprisingly, vision, arguing that in domestic policy the New Deal was less effective simply because FDR's improvisational approach to policymaking never allowed his administration to articulate an overall concept to the public of what it was trying to do. Professor Greenstein has played a major role in the rehabilitation of President Eisenhower among presidential scholars and he again provides a largely positive portrait here. His attribution of "vision" to Eisenhower is unconvincing to this reviewer, however. Greenstein argues that Eisenhower had "clarity" in his individual policy goals (p. 56)—such as the Interstate Highway System—but it seems to be stretching the concept rather far to say that this amounted to a "vision" in the same sense of Ronald Reagan's mantra that "government is the problem."

Greenstein's framework also better enables us to understand the reasons for the "failures," and The Presidential Difference includes a fair and measured discussion of the two presidents who constituted the most dramatic "failures"—LBJ and Nixon. Both of these men had high congnitive capacities and strong political skills, yet while both had extraordinary records of accomplishment in office, LBJ escalated America's involvement in the most disastrous war in its history and divided the nation, while Nixon became the first presidential incumbent to resign in disgrace after exposure of his illegal actions in the Watergate cover-up. Greenstein attributes much of the blame for these disasters to the flawed "emotional intelligence" of both incumbents, that is, their inability to prevent their emotions from undermining the political goals of their administrations.

Ultimately this is a deceptively useful and insightful book. What initially appears to be a simple collection of biographical sketches on FDR and his successors turns out to challenge some of the prevailing tools of presidential analysis and to provide new ones that help illuminate the actual operations of the office. The focus on individuality and instability in the institution of the Presidency is a welcome reminder of what a strange and volatile office it is. By reminding us of the degree to which the functioning of the contemporary political system is contingent on the styles, personality, and even emotional stability of individual presidents, The Presidential Difference should further enhance our regard for the wisdom of James Madison and John Marshall in establishing effective legislative and judicial checks on presidential power.

Wealth in America: Trends in Wealth Inequality. By Lisa A. Keister. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000. 307p. $59.95 cloth, $19.95 paper.

Marilyn Dantico, Arizona State University

Lisa Keister's work offers students of research methods, and of public policy, an ideal model. It also offers, albeit indirectly, a study that should inform policy makers as they discuss proposals to alter inheritance and estate tax policies and privatize Social Security. Wealth in America explores the distribution of household resources from 1962 through 1995. Questions regarding the distribution of wealth in the United States are seldom addressed directly because readily available data do not permit a straightforward approach. Because it is easier to deal with questions related to the distribution of income than with the distribution of wealth, research generally focuses on income distribution and we assume that there is a relatively straightforward relationship between the two. Keister tackles the data problems associated with measuring household assets allowing her to evaluate the distribution of wealth. Since measuring assets at any point in time is a challenge, it is all the more remarkable that she is able to examine changes in the distribution of household assets over time.

Her painstaking assembly of data, her resourceful use of simulations to supplement existing data sources, and her skilled analysis are the foundationstones of her contribution. They are the basis of her argument, and permit her to accomplish her goal of producing "a longitudinal picture of household wealth distribution and accumulation processes" (p. 260). Keister's database, comprised of historic data, surveys, aggregate household wealth data, estate tax records, simulation estimates, and experiments based on simulated data, is massive. She draws on government documents for the period 1962 to 1995. Her simulation model allows her to answer a variety of questions, including the questions related to the effects of stock market fluctuations or boons in the housing market.

This work addresses basic questions regarding social structure, some of which have been examined empirically by others. But no other work is as painstakingly thorough. Consistent with studies of income distribution, Keister reports that the top 1% of wealth holders expanded their holdings over time. What is surprising is that the maldistribution of wealth far exceeds the maldistribution of income. Some of the change is attributable to individual choices, or, one might argue, to the limits set on less-well-off individuals by their access to choices. She points out, for example, that the poor, especially the nonwhite poor, have fewer and more expensive banking services than other segments of the population. Thus, their debt load is increased relative to others' when they borrow money for a mortgage or when they conduct routine banking transactions. Moreover, the wealthy, unlike those with few assets, keep relatively much of their money in "high-risk" assets; middle-class and low-income families have relatively much of their money invested in housing and cash accounts, which are low-risk and low-reward assets. Demographic variables account for some differences; wealthy Americans, for example, have smaller families than other Americans. Raising children, while clearly necessary and sometimes eulogized by policy makers, is inconsistent with asset accumulation. More important than family size, though, is where one starts out in the system; while education may improve one's earning capacity, it is not sufficient to change one's position relative to the wealthy. Keister argues that the wealthy control so many assets that for any change in the distribution of wealth to occur, they must hold fewer assets.

While these findings may seem obvious to some, her exploration of race effects is less so. She reports that there are virtually no nonwhite families among top wealth holders. Keister's simulated data inform an experiment removing the direct effects of race from wealth accumulation. The experimental data indicate that variables such as education and family size, which interact with race, are sufficient to sustain patterns of wealth inequality. When the question of family wealth is entered into the question of well-being, racial inequalities are greater than research on income, education, and other social status indicators suggests. The effects of race on wealth accumulation are shockingly robust.

Keister's work draws from a number of traditions, and it speaks to each in turn. those familiar with the life cycle studies of Franco Modigliani, and Edward Wolff's explorations of the distribution of wealth, will be intrigued by Keister's additions to the field. Those who have followed the efforts of Melvin Oliver and Thomas Shapiro to examine the effects of race will be drawn by the scope of Keister's undertaking as she examines the wealth distribution among African-American and Latino families, and with her speculations about wealth accumulation among Asian-American families. Those interested in the impacts of age on wealth accumulation will also benefit from a careful review of Keister's work.

Keister's work leads to some painful conclusions. She documents wealth inequalities far in excess of income inequalities and an increase in wealth inequalities over time. She is bold in her evaluation of some of the impediments to wealth accumulation, noting, for example, the negative impacts of inconsistent banking practices and casting a shadow over the promise that education and thrift will lead to social mobility. Yet her evaluation of policies intended to move middle-income wage earners into long-term investments is somewhat timid; she argues that more time must lapse before we can reach conclusions regarding social experiments such as Individual Retirement Accounts.

This is not a book for the untrained. It is a sophisticated methodological treatise suitable for classroom use in upper-division undergraduate seminars and by graduate students. It will also serve staff members for policymakers, who will be able to use this work to point to the persistent causes of inequalities that require attention as policies are developed.

Tangled Up in Red, White, and Blue: New Social Movements in America. By Christine A. Kelly. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2001. 192p. $67.95 cloth, $22.95 paper.

Karen Beckwith, The College of Wooster

Research on political movements remains peripheral to the discipline of political science, or, to put it more optimistically, outstanding research on political movements has relied upon interdisciplinary and intersubfield research strategies and is building an increasing presence within the discipline. The importance and emergence of this arena of scholarship make it difficult not to celebrate Christine Kelly's Tangled Up in Red, White, and Blue, a work that offers a synthesis of political theory and empirical political movement research, employing comparative case studies of several new social movements in the United States.

Christine Kelly's thesis is that broad structural explanations for social movement emergence, form, and success are insufficient for understanding new social movements in the United States and that "national institutional settings and ideological traditions" (p. xii) are essential components that shape the context within which movements act. Accepting the construct of "new social movement" for the U.S. case, Kelly argues that the U.S. movements have been trapped between a co-opted liberal interest group model, on the one hand, and marginalization and defeat, on the other, a "bifurcated pattern [that] has its roots in the early Civil Rights movement" (p. 103). Kelly's goal is to provide the theoretical basis upon which U.S. movements can escape this pattern, engage in greater ideological reflexivity, and, ultimately, succeed.

Kelly begins by recuperating liberal democratic tenets of modernism—"rule of law, public accountability, and autonomy"—against modernism's "instrumental modes—concentrated capitalist accumulation, administrative rationality [and] natural resource exhaustion" (p. 4). She offers accounts of Hobbes's, Kant's, and Dewey's notions of reason and citizen responsibility in the state context to position her arguments concerning the value of Enlightenment traditions of freedom, moving to an evaluation of Habermas' contributions to democratic practice and renewal, particularly his concept of "communicative action." On the basis of her theoretical analysis, Kelly concludes that "the only practical arena [for social movement action] is... the state itself" (p. 65) and that social movements, in targeting the state, must ensure the institutionalization of radical democratic processes.

Three U.S. movements—Populist, Progressive, and Socialist—serve to exemplify the historical dimensions of antidemocratic resistance and cooptational strategies. Kelly employs these case studies to demonstrate the persistent failures to institutionalize radical democratic processes that would ensure a meaningful, progressive, and "class ethic"-based mass politics (pp. 161–64). She then turns to three post-1968 new social movements—the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), the Youth International Party (Yippies), and Redstockings, the New York City-based women's liberation group—and, finally, to two Reagan-era movement campaigns—the antiapartheid organizing and the anti-Gulf War protests—both of which are treated as student-based.

These multiple and various cases are employed to demonstrate the weaknesses of U.S. new social movements (NSMs), with their emphasis on identity, their antistate stance, and their "overemphasis on the prefigurative" (p. 139). Characterized by "opposition to representative institutions and universal (or shared) values and [relying] heavily on the symbolic" (p. 139), new social movements have been unable to challenge the state or to find ways of institutionalizing processes that would sustain mass citizen democratic participation. They have also failed, Kelly argues, to "[present] a coherent theoretical alternative to the dominant order" (p. 173). Kelly's solution to the ineffectiveness of the new social movements she examined is to embrace a "class ethic," to organize "a democratic confederation of the social movement base with parliamentarian capabilities" (p. 171), and to engage in procedural institutional reform that would concretize mass democratic participation (p. 172)

Tangled Up in Red, White, and Blue has flaws that should give the reader/scholar/movement activist pause. Kelly's conclusions, for example, raise questions about the standards she employs to evaluate movement strategy and success. She concludes her book with a plea for a "more reflexive ideology" and "constitutionally established procedures ensuring accountability (and recall) [that] must bind participants" (p. 161) and urges social movement activists "to thematize the impact of the accumulation process generally and in relations to NSM aims" (p. 162). Yet her emphasis on "electoral and related institutional reforms" (p. 171) is a call for procedural change, a move the Progressive movement advanced a century ago, resulting, according to Kelly, in its co-optation (p. 93). Although Kelly makes such a call in the context of "a class ethic and . . . a democratically structured confederalism" (p. 171), she does not explain how new social movements would escape the cooptation that she claims the Progressive movement experienced.

More serious is the outdated nature of the research and the citations. Chapter One's concern with resource mobilization versus new social movement theory focuses on a 1980s-1990s debate that has been superceded by political opportunity theorizing, claims about the role of emotions in social movements, and a clear cultural turn among many social movement scholars, as evidenced by Mary Fainsod Katzenstein (Faithful and Fearless: Moving Feminist Protest Inside the Church and the Military, 1998), Enrique Larana, Hank Johnston, and Joseph R. Gusfield (eds., New Social Movements: From Ideology to Identity, 1994), Marco Giugni, Doug McAdam, and Charles Tilly (eds., How Social Movements Matter, 1999), and Nancy Whittier (Feminist Generations: The Persistence of the Radical Women's Movement, 1995), among others. Moreover, a major theoretical work by Jean L. Cohen and Andrew Arato (Civil Society and Political Theory, 1992) is missing from Kelly's discussion and from her references; now a decade old, this work is a critical analysis of civil society, social movements, and democratic theory and is highly relevant to Kelly's arguments.

Kelly's insistence, in Chapter Six, that political opportunity theory is overly deterministic (pp. 164–67) has long been recognized. Political scientists and sociologists have theorized and documented the creation of opportunities by movement activists (see, e.g., Sidney Tarrow, Power in Movement, 1998; Doug McAdam, John D. McCarthy, and Mayer Zald, eds., Comparative Perspectives on Social Movements, 1996; and Lee Ann Banaszak, Why Movements Succeed or Fail, 1996). It is unfortunate that an energetic and passionate treatise such as Tangled Up in Red, White and Blue has failed to incorporate these major contributions to political movement research.

More generally, however, Tangled Up in Red, White, and Blue commits two major (and common) errors of political movement research. The first is movement omniscience, the unstated and often unrecognized assumption that a correct strategy and a correct set of choices are always available to political movements. To borrow a phrase from a famous leftist theorist, movements may not do exactly as they please, nor do they always have (nor can they always create) opportunities for success. In her discussions of specific movements, Kelly identifies missed opportunities, mistakes, and failures of social movements, without providing the context within which movement decisions might be evaluated. Omissions include the active strategizing of committed movement opponents, the violent and repressive actions of the state (a notable omission in the discussion of SNCC), the lack of support in public opinion, and disruptive historical events (such as assassinations). Kelly's claim that the U.S. student movement of the 1980s dissolved due to "its inability to discern and engage...the institutional and economic context in which it is enmeshed" (p. 128) suggests that a proper discernment might have led to its success, regardless of other factors. Similarly, her suggestion that "the eventual failure of the socialist movement...resulted from the inability of movements to recognize" the political and ideological, rather than purely economic, nature of their struggle (p. 161) places the burden of proof solely on movements and employs the very determinism that she earlier rejects.

The second error is that of movement myopia, or generalizing from the scholar's own political involvement in or close experience with a specific movement. In Kelly's case, her activist history concerns campus-based anti-nuclear weapons and antiapartheid campaigns (pp. ix-xi); her selection of new social movement cases relies heavily on student movements. This emphasis obscures the strength and successes of national organizing in movements such as CISPES (the Committee in Solidarity with the People of EI Salvador); the reader is given little sense of its national scope, the widespread involvement of nonstudent communities, especially churches, and the multiracial aspect of the coalition. Despite examples of antiapartheid organizing and of SNCC, there is too little discussion of race—perhaps the most distinctive "exceptionalism" of U.S. politics. Antiracist movements are discussed without reference to the long history and continuity of antiracist struggles and their different manifestations as these movements have responded to changing political conditions, shifts in electoral power, and alternations of support from and attack by state authorities. The lack of citations of the recent literature on SNCC, such as Cheryl Lynn Greenberg's (ed., 1998) A Circle of Trust: Remembering SNCC and Clayborne Carson's (1995) In Struggle: SNCC and the Black Awakening of the 1960s, is particularly lamentable.

Across the last decade, political movement scholarship has increased its presence within political science, incorporating methods and perspectives from a variety of research traditions, developing a sophisticated, interdisciplinary theoretical repertoire, and relying on and speaking from scholars' experiences of movement activism. Tangled Up in Red, White, and Blue—ambitious, wide-ranging, and passionate about new social movements—makes less of a contribution to this endeavor than it might have.

Bitter Fruit: The Politics of Black-Korean Conflict in New York City. By Claire Jean Kim. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2000. 300p. $37.50.

Richard M. Merelman, The University of Wisconsin—Madison

In this case study of the 1990 Red Apple Boycott of two Korean-owned produce stores in Brooklyn, New York, Claire Kim narrates a complex story of resurgent Black Nationalism, the rise of Korean resistance to blacks, and the fateful temporizing of Mayor David Dinkins, whose belated crossing of the boycott picket lines deeply injured his mayoralty. Kim has high ambitions in telling this story; she wishes to use it to displace a flawed "racial scapegoating" theory of black—Korean relations and to advance in its stead her own theory of "racial ordering" in the United States.

Kim's narrative of the Red Apple Boycott is more effective than is her theoretical analysis. While she offers an engrossing study of racial politics in New York City, her larger theory does not persuasively explain the events she describes.

Kim's 69 interviews, her extensive analysis of primary sources, her depiction of media coverage, and her sociodemographic data support her contention that the Red Apple Boycott was indeed an episode of resurgent Black Nationalism. Kim effectively connects the boycott to Black Nationalist activism during the Koch administration and black reactions to white racist attacks in Howard Beach and Bensonhurst. She demonstrates that well-known Black Nationalist leaders quickly took over the leadership of the boycott, which emerged after an altercation between a Korean store owner and a Haitian woman customer. The leaders of the boycott did indeed intend their action to further Black Nationalist goals. Moreover, the boycott was part of a long tradition of Black Nationalist politics in New York City. That the boycott persisted for eight months sustains Kim's argument that previous Black Nationalist efforts had effectively prepared the black population for sustained political action.

Nevertheless, Kim does not quite achieve her goal of establishing that the Red Apple Boycott was an example of "purposive, collective action" (p. 3). Kim argues that the boycotters aimed to "punish the offending merchants, to defy and disrupt the power structure, to bring Black immigrants under the Black Power umbrella, and to raise Black people's consciousness about racial oppression in America" (p. 125). But these purposes emerged at different moments, and often appear as much to be rationalizations after the fact as established goals prior to the events. True, the boycott did harm the offending merchants (but not other Korean shopkeepers); however, its clumsy elevation of African Americans over immigrant Haitians seems unlikely to have extended Black Power to these immigrants. Nor did the boycott disrupt "the power structure," since, if Kim is correct, Koreans are not part of the power structure. Nor could it have raised black people's consciousness of racial oppression in America, since most American blacks probably knew nothing of it, and those in New York City hardly needed a boycott to confirm their consciousness of racial grievance.

And what, as a case of purposive collective action, did the boycott actually accomplish? Little good. The boycott alienated Koreans, who for the first time engaged in serious political countermobilization. The boycott helped bring down the first elected black mayor in New York City, David Dinkins, whose departure elevated to power the hostile Rudolph Giulani and his police-friendly policies, which specifically targeted blacks. And the boycott further diminished the already reduced stores of Jewish liberalism in New York City politics. Of course, these facts don't demonstrate that the boycotters were not engaged in purposive collective action; however, they do make us question the rationality of these actions.

Need the boycott have faltered? Kim implies so; she states that "racial power cleans up after itself. It inevitably generates protest by subordinated groups, but it also names, interprets, and ultimately silences that protest" (p. 219). Kim draws this conclusion largely because of the theory of racial power she advances as antidote to a flawed theory of racial scapegoating, which marginalizes episodes of black-Korean conflict as irrational, decontextualized, emotional outbursts. In contrast, Kim asserts that a distinct structure of racial power in the United States consistently "racializes" new immigrant groups, orders racial minorities hierarchically, and utilizes such devices as "color-blind" language, myth (i.e., Koreans as a "model minority," blacks as an "underclass"), political exclusion, economic stratification, spatial segregation, and media bias to contain the inevitable episodes of conflict that racial ordering spawns. Within this order Koreans are a "triangulated" group; they possess a favored cultural position as a model minority, and they enjoy relative economic success, but they are permanently foreign and "unassimilable" (p. 45). As the failure of the Red Apple Boycott demonstrates, this racial order effectively resists disruption.

Although Kim's theory has virtues, it suffers from inaccuracies, nonfalsifiable propositions, exaggerations, anthropomorphism, and, most important, a gap between structure and agency. Kim inaccurately argues that the racial order "excludes Asian Americans from civic membership" (p. 16). This is historically false and, worse, denies to the Koreans in her story their own repeated avowals of American civic nationalism. Perhaps such statements are part of the false consciousness bred by color-blind language, but the concept of color-blind language is itself problematic, for it makes Kim's theory nonfalsifiable. If color-blind language is, like explicitly racial language, a part of racial power, there is no empirical condition that could disconfirm Kim's theory of racialization. Also, Kim consistently exaggerates her arguments; for example, she repeatedly refers to unfavorable media coverage of the boycotts as the "official line" (p. 193ff), though she never identifies any "officials" who direct this coverage.

Most important, the theory of racial power produces a kind of anthropomorphic determinism that simply doesn't account for actors' interpretations of events. "Racial power" is a general structural concept, which operates only through the actions of real people. It is too far from Kim's structural theory to Sonny Carson's (a Black Nationalist leader) explanation of the boycott ("the reason for the boycott was that a Black woman was slapped" [p. 124]). Nothing in the theory accounts for either the slap or the reaction to it; moreover, little that is resonant of the theory surfaces in actors' statements of their own motives. A satisfying theory of racial politics must connect structure to agency more closely than does Kim's theory of racial order.

The Politics of Automobile Insurance Reform: Ideas, Institutions, and Public Policy in North America. By Edward L. Lascher, Jr. Washington, DC: Georgetown University Press, 1999. 160p. S69.00

Martin Lubin, Plattsburgh State University of New York

Why do policymakers in any one given jurisdiction choose one approach rather than another for dealing with the common public policy challenge of deciding how to revise state and provincial automobile insurance regulatory regimes? And even within any one specific political jurisdiction (of a North American subnational "universe" of 50 states plus 10 provinces), why do policy outcomes change over time? What determines legislative policy decisions?

This readable and well-reasoned study examines how Canadian provincial and U.S. state levels of government, which exercise primary jurisdiction over the regulation of private passenger automobile insurance within each of these neighboring First World democratic federations, have tried in a variety of ways to lessen the extent of significantly increasing rates over the past 20 years. Among the people of both Canada and the United States, the automobile is widely believed to be a necessity. Given that auto insurance is virtually compulsory everywhere in North America, whenever insurance premium costs rapidly rise, citizens so burdened look to their elected politicians to provide some relief.

Conventional wisdom as well as a substantial amount of scholarship reviewed in chapter 2 highlights the impact of interest groups on elected policymakers. The existing literature on auto insurance politics per se claims that policy outcomes can be sufficiently understood as the result of varying pressures by a multitude of competing interested groups. Policy choices are explained in terms of responses to demands of politically relevant actors other than elected officials themselves. Thus, from a pressure politics perspective, auto insurance policy is understood as the end product of competition among insurance companies, consumer groups, and trial lawyers. In contrast, Lascher argues that power politics alone is insufficient to explain longitudinal variance over time within single jurisdictions whenever legislators enact or block reforms. Rather, adoption of major no-fault reforms stems from many policymakers' beliefs that such policy initiatives are likely to bring about desirable consequences, i.e., lower rates, and, simultaneously, no significant decline in the number of insurance providers.

Beliefs about the practicality of specific reform proposals emanate from two competing stories. The latter furnish to elected officials divergent "villains" to blame, explanations as to why past efforts to control rates failed, elements needed to effect successful reform, and predictions of the likely effects of adopting one proposal rather than another (p. 40–41). The "Profiteering Story" portrays the insurance industry as inefficient, noncompetitive, and unaccountable to the public. Conversely, the "Pogo Story" attributes the premiums crises to sharply rising medical reimbursements and the machinations of trial lawyers. Politicians who embrace Pogo opt for some variation of no-fault; adherents of Profiteering prefer tight regulation or rate rollbacks.

There are also differences in public policy between provinces and states because the provinces' parliamentary legislative systems make it easier to adopt as well as reverse far-reaching reforms whenever the problem diagnosis of party leaders shift. Westminster-style unicameral legislatures in Canada concentrate authority in fewer hands, and as a consequence, fewer points of interest group access exist than in separation of powers-style U.S. bicameral (except Nebraska) legislatures. Therefore, provincial governing majority party leaders have a greater ability to impose losses upon powerful vested interests opposed to drastic reforms than U.S. governors and legislative party chieftains do.

Chapters 3 through 7 distill and analyze information from the following sources: previously published aggregate data; surveys of people familiar with auto insurance reform throughout the 60 North American subnational jurisdictions (only five states failed to respond); and case studies based upon review of stories in newspapers of record as well as interviews with politicians, regulatory agency personnel, newspaper reporters, interest-group representatives, and academics involved with the issue.

The Pennsylvania case study in chapter 4 describes how, for the first time since the mid-1970s, a traditional tort state adopted any sort of no-fault system. This package also imposed mandatory rate reductions and a medical cost containment system. Three major groups considered to be highly influential in the Quaker state, all of whom opposed Act 6 (1990) were losers—namely, trial lawyers, insurance companies, and medical providers. In this jurisdiction, the legislation represents an instance where major change was effected despite opposition by well-entrenched interest groups. Moreover, the actual effects of the policy do in fact appear to be consistent with the claims of the sponsors of Act 6. On the other hand, the Rhode Island case study in chapter 5 examines the failure in 1993 to secure legislation similar to Pennsylvania's Act 6. Instead of pressure theory, which appears to be insufficient to explain the divergent trajectories of policymakers in Pennsylvania and Rhode Island, Lascher hypothesizes that Pennsylvania legislators more readily internalized the Pogo Story and rejected the Profiteering Story than did lawmakers in most other states including Rhode Island, because the facts support Pogo more than Profiteering. Chapter 6 describes and explains the Ontario Liberal government's move from a rate control to a no-fault insurance approach between 1987 (when the industry's advice was ignored) and 1989 (when its advice was followed) and the successor Ontario NDP government's decision between 1990, upon coming to power, and mid-1991 to abandon plans for a public auto insurance system. Ontario Liberal leaders were unconvinced that a public system would be effective because it did not really address the real source of the problem— Pogo. Similarly, the NDP government's abandonment of a traditional ideologically driven party plank on public auto insurance is explained in terms of changes in what the NDP leaders believed about consequences of policy choices; they lost faith in the Profiteering Story while confronting the full reality of the costs of a public takeover.

In conclusion, I must concur with the author that politics is not always reducible to a "bargaining game" between powerful groups and politicians. We students of comparative politics and policy should "pay more attention to the stories decision makers tell about the nature of the problems they are asked to address" (p. 122), although such stories may well be deliberately put into the heads of elected officials by various political actors, including influential interest groups.

The Politics of Force: Media and the Construction of Police Brutality. By Regina G. Lawrence. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2000. 254p. $45.00 cloth, $17.95 paper.

Fred Meyer, Ball State University

Regina Lawrence makes a major contribution to the criminal justice policy literature in her book, The Politics of Force: Media and the Construction of Police Brutality. She helps observers of the criminal justice system understand one of the reasons the crime control model is the dominant one in the United States. To do this she studies two major police departments, New York and Los Angeles, and the reporting of police use of force incidents in the New York Times and the Los Angeles Times, respectively. Generally, the viewpoint of the police is presented in the newspaper accounts of the incidents. The police explanation involves blaming the individual wrongdoer without any serious discussion of systemic problems in the operation of the police department. In other words, the police view reinforces the crime control model, with its stress on the rapid and efficient removal of wrongdoers from the streets of this country. Thus Lawrence helps the reader understand why the views of police critics do not receive the same level of coverage as does the official view presented to the press by the police bureaucracy. In her concern with the definition of public problems, she contributes to a theory of issue construction. The significance of her findings is reinforced by her data sources: two major American newspapers including the New York Times, which is read by political elites throughout the United States. The data in the book are based on a content analysis of the New York Times and the Los Angeles Times from 1984 to 1995. Also, an extensive analysis of the Rodney King case is presented. The information about the King case was garnered from a variety of newspapers and magazines. In addition, Lawrence gathered information for her study by interviewing reporters and police experts in New York, Los Angeles, and other cities.

In introducing the reader to her research design, Lawrence combines two literatures: that of political communication and that of political science and public policy. Thus the social construction of the news is seen as part of political competition to designate and define public problems. She looks at the problem of police brutality through this social constructionist lense. Thus the social construction of public problems in the news allocates resources in such a way as to benefit the owner of the problem. The political significance of the news is that it validates the view of reality of some players and marginalizes the reality of others. In the context of this study, the reality of the police bureaucracy is the one that is validated most frequently according to the data presented. One of the distinct disadvantages of nonofficials and grassroot groups is that they are rarely drawn upon as a primary news source by reporters. The major opportunity for such groups to present systemic critiques of the police occurs when an unplanned event such as the Rodney King incident takes place. Then the alternative reality will be presented. Accidental events have the potential to reshape the public policy dialogue surrounding a particular problem. As Lawrence points out in her extensive discussion of the Rodney King incident, the public dialogue ultimately led to the dismissal of Chief Gates in Los Angeles. However, empirical confirmation is presented that the official view of issues predominates. It is the exception to the rule to find the article with extensive systemic critiques of police departments.

A variety of factors limits the ability of the critics of police in having their criticism presented. Lawrence points out that generally these people will not present an alternative explanation to that presented by the police. The police critics will stress the unreasonableness of the police use of force but will generally not have data to substantiate claims of a recurring pattern of violence based on race or socioeconomic status of the victim. The police response involved preemptive damage control. Lawrence found that the police would assert that the suspects who were killed were uncooperative, combative, violent, or threatening. The official explanation involved individualizing the causation and denying that the brutality is patterned.

The official explanation is reinforced by the norm of journalistic professionalism. Lawrence points out that the beat system used by reporters involves the use of officials as a source of news. Those at the top of the large bureaucracies such as the police have a distinct advantage. The norm involves the notion that the views of officials should be presented in as unbiased a manner as possible. Thus the reporter will present the views of the police bureaucracy since the most competent news sources are perceived to be the official sources.

The prevailing public discourse of crime control also is cited as a significant limit on the critics of the police. The predominant public view is that crime is a problem of the moral failings of weak and deviant individuals. Swift punishment is seen as a necessary response for the society to deal effectively with the behavior of these deviant individuals.

Lawrence presents a typology of critical story cues that influence how use-of-force incidents are presented. Competing accounts of events are greatly influenced by families of the victim. The accounts of witnesses are very important. The race of the victim is also a very important cue since it engages the norm of media reformism. The King case presented a combination of these cues. Of course, the videotaping of the event was of particular importance. Generally, those alleging police brutality do not have the resources to present their views in such a manner as to be considered newsworthy, however.

The style of presentation in this book is very engaging. Lawrence cites much of the significant literature in criminal justice policy. Also, her analysis is presented in such a way that the reader can make inferential leaps between her theoretical analysis and events that are currently taking place in police operations. The reader obtains insight into the Louima and Diallo incidents. When official explanations of such incidents do not involve a systemic analysis of the behavior, one might expect additional incidents such as these since the official explanation lacks a sanction for the behavior.

This book would be ideal for use in courses dealing with criminal justice policy, public policy, urban politics, and the media. It is written in a lively and interesting manner so that undergraduates should generally find it intriguing.

This reviewer would hope that Lawrence continues her work in this area. Specifically, her next book could look at political decision makers such as mayors and city council members to identify the relationship between media portrayals of use-of-force incidents and the salience of the issue in the decision-making process of the political elite of a city.

Sizing Up the Senate: The Unequal Consequences of Equal Representation. By Frances E. Lee and Bruce I. Oppenheimer. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1999. 304p. $48.00 cloth, $17.00 paper.

Michael Bailey, Georgetown University

The principles of state-based representation in the Senate and "one person, one vote" reside comfortably, yet incongruously in the American political psyche. Few of us have lectured on the Senate without raising this point. We carry on about Wyoming and California and their equal number of Senators. Perhaps our lectures extend to discussion of policy issues: Would Clarence Thomas have been confirmed if the Senate were apportioned based on population? and so on. But seldom does the discussion go much further. And, strikingly, this has been true even in the academy. We have 1,001 ways to measure committee preferences, but we know relatively little about the effects of state-based representation in the Senate. Lee and Oppenheimer's book changes this state of affairs and offers an excellent account of the importance of state-based representation for the Senate and beyond.

The book is unflaggingly solid. The authors raise interesting questions and methodically parse them out and look to the data for answers. The opening section is on Senate apportionment in a historical perspective. Lee and Oppenheimer make the case that historical contingencies rather than functional design explain equal apportionment in the Senate. The strength here is not the novelty of the argument—for the main thrust is common in historical work—but the useful summary of the constitutional origins of the Senate. This provides helpful background for what is to come and, in fact, would provide excellent material for debate on the merits of the state-based representation in the Senate.

The next chapter discusses Senate apportionment and the representational experience. Do constituents in smaller states have different experiences with their Senators? Here, the authors show exactly what anyone would expect. Of course small-state Senators are more likely to know their constituents than large-state Senators. This kind of pattern emerges no matter how the data are sliced. But it is useful to know, rather than assert, this fact. And, what is more, the chapter makes our knowledge more specific: 38% of Delawarians had met Joe Biden, while only 3% of New Yorkers had met Al D'Amato. It is up to the reader to decide which state is better off.

Lee and Oppenheimer then turn to studying the effects of differential population on elections and fund-raising in the Senate. There are several interesting findings. Their statistical analysis indicates that small-state elections tend to be less competitive, but not because there is a larger incumbency advantage in them. This is fascinating in light of the earlier findings that small-state Senators have much closer personal ties to their constituents. What is the explanation for this? Elections are about differences and voters know that whomever they elect will have (or may already have) the close ties that the current Senator has. The authors also show that small-state Senators raise money much, much more easily. There appears to be a pretty fixed amount of PAC money that can be raised by all Senators. This ripe fruit falls to the ground easily and small-state Senators need little more to run effective campaigns. Large-state Senators need much more and so spend their time on ladders high up in the trees, struggling for every last contribution they can pull in. Little wonder, then, that Senate leaders hail from small states.

Representation in the Senate also matters for policy outcomes. The authors argue that policies are designed to benefit a majority of states, not necessarily a majority of House districts. This translates into more spending for small states. This effect is particularly strong for distributive programs, in part because, as the authors showed earlier, small-state Senators tend toward service-oriented committees rather than policy committees. For formula-based programs the advantages to small states accrue due to Senate efforts to ensure that any population-based funding formula sets a minimum level for each state, in effect ensuring disproportionate spending in small states.

In summary, this book succeeds at its stated goal of attracting attention to an important and understudied topic. They show that even though Madison has generally been right that politics has seldom divided big states against small states, the unequal power of small states in the Senate has, nonetheless, had important implications. As the authors say, state-based representation in the Senate "leaves no aspect of the institution untouched" (p. 225). Now that politics may be dividing more along state size lines (consider the famous red-blue divide in the electoral map of the 2000 presidential election), these questions will only increase in importance.

It Didn't Happen Here: Why Socialism Failed in the United States. By Seymour Martin Lipset and Gary Marks. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000. 379p. $26.95 cloth, $14.95 paper.

Martin Shefter, Cornell University

Although It Didn't Happen Here addresses a rather familiar question—Why is there no socialism in the United States?—this is an exciting book. Its central chapters discuss the major explanations for American "exceptionalism" that have been proposed over the past century—namely, the distinctive character of U.S. political institutions, the ethnic heterogeneity of the nation's population, the divisions between labor unions and the socialist party, the sectarianism of American socialists, the repression that radicals encountered, etc. Political scientists will find the topics of many of these chapters familiar too.

I say that the "topics" of these chapters will be familiar—rather than their "contents"—because there is much that even knowledgeable readers will learn from this book. Seymour Martin Lipset and Gary Marks are extraordinarily erudite and productive: The list of their books at the beginning of this volume runs to 27 titles. Even more impressive than the breadth of the authors' knowledge of political and labor history is the ingenuity of the comparisons and contrasts they use to assess the various theories of American "exceptionalism" discussed in their book.

For example, Theodore Lowi suggests that federalism explains the absence of socialism in the United States. He argues that in the United States, "[e]ven as the economy became national... the states remained the source and focus of politics. There was, in effect, no national pattern of law, legitimation, or repression to confirm a socialist critique ("Why Is There No Socialism in the United States? A Federal Analysis," in Robert T. Golembiewski and Aaron Wildavsky, eds., The Costs of Federalism 1984, p. 37.)

Lipset and Marks deploy both cross-national and withincountry comparisons to challenge Lowi's argument. They note that federalism did not preclude socialism in Australia. The several British colonies on the Australian continent— Queensland, Victoria, New South Wales, etc.—formed a national government only in 1901. And the new national government of Australia was granted less power than the national government of the United States. In other words, in Australia there was less of a "national pattern of law, legitimation or repression to confirm a socialist critique" than in the United States. Yet, contrary to what Lowi's argument would lead one to expect, within a decade of its founding, the Australian national government came under the control of the world's first labor administration.

Lipset and Marks also note that federalism enabled a number of socialistic or quasi-socialistic political movements to come to power at the provincial or state level in both Canada and the United States. In Saskatchewan, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and its successor, the New Democratic Party, controlled the provincial government for all but a dozen years from 1944 to the present; in British Columbia, for all but a half-dozen years between 1972 and 1999; and in Manitoba, for all but four years between 1967 and 1986. In the United States, the "semi-social democratic" Nonpartisan League (NPL) gained power in North Dakota in 1918. Upon gaining power, the NPL established state credit banks and state-owned grain terminals, flour mills, packing houses, and cold storage plants. Similar movements won elections in Oklahoma, Minnesota, Wisconsin, California, Oregon, and Washington in the 1920s and 1930s. In other words, federalism did not preclude socialism in Australia, Canada, or even the United States. Although socialists never won control at the national level in either Canada or the United States, in both nations federalism made it possible for socialistic or quasi-socialistic political forces to exercise substantial governmental power in those regions of the country where their support was concentrated.

By analyzing arcane cases—cases that, they readily acknowledge, may be extreme or deviant-Lipset and Marks do more than simply challenge the arguments of other social scientists; often they are able to refine these arguments. For example, it has often been suggested that radicals found it difficult to unite the American working class behind the doctrine of socialism, because many industrial workers were recent immigrants to the United States. But what was it about these immigrants that made them deaf to socialist appeals? Does the very fact that they had moved from their home countries to the United States indicate that immigrants believed America to be a land of opportunity and, hence, were not receptive to socialism? Or was it that the linguistic and cultural divisions between immigrants and other Americans were more salient than whatever economic problems they shared with their new neighbors?

Lipset and Marks assess these and other possibilities by analyzing deviant cases—cities where socialism was unusually strong. The socialist party dominated politics in Milwaukee for a longer period of time than in any other large American city. During the half-century of socialist strength (1910–1960), Milwaukee had a large population of first- and secondgeneration immigrants, but the great majority of them came from a single country, namely, Germany. That is, despite its large immigrant population, Milwaukee was fairly homogeneous ethnically. This suggests to Lipset and Marks that divisions flowing from ethnic heterogeneity, more than impediments stemming from immigration itself, created problems for socialists. They note that several other cities where socialists were unusually strong—such as Minneapolis, Minnesota, and Reading, Pennsylvania—had large, but ethnically homogeneous, immigrant populations. Surely, there are few sources to which political scientists can turn for an illuminating discussion of interactions among socialist parties, labor unions, and local singing groups in Milwaukee, Minneapolis, and Reading other than this volume by Seymour Martin Lipset and Gary Marks!

Rediscovering the Democratic Purposes of Education. Edited by Lorraine M. McDonnell, P. Michael Timpane, and Roger Benjamin. Lawrence: The University Press of Kansas, 2000. 280p. $40 cloth, $17.95 paper.

Christine Rossell, Boston University

The public discourse on the purpose of education is dominated by functionalist or human capital theory, which argues that the primary purpose of schools is to impart to citizens skills that will be needed to compete and win in the U.S. marketplace and the global economy. This edited volume attempts to correct this imbalance by emphasizing civics education and political socialization as important functions of schools.

The nine chapters are authored by distinguished scholars who share a common concern for the scholarly neglect of schooling's political dimensions. There are three sections: (1) "The Philosophy and Practice of Civic Education," which contains five chapters on the historical origins of civic education and its current practice; (2) "Approaches to Studying the Politics of Education," which contains three chapters on school governance; and (3) "Focusing on Democratic Purposes: Implications for Education Policy," which contains one chapter on the extent to which school practices or strategies to increase educational equity have succeeded.

McDonnell argues in the introductory chapter that a strong case can be made for emphasizing the democratic purposes of education because we are at a low point in political participation in American civic life and perhaps in a crisis of legitimacy with regard to schools and government institutions. As McDonnell herself points out, however, it is easier to make the case that the current low levels of political participation and civic identity require a greater emphasis on schooling's democratic purposes than on demonstrating that such attention will solve or ameliorate these problems. McDonnell nevertheless presents evidence that suggests that it would.

This introductory chapter is followed by a chapter on the history of civic education by Lorraine Pangle and Thomas Pangle, another on that topic by Carl Kaestle, a chapter on the importance of civic education by Amy Gutman, and a chapter by Pamela Conover and Donald Searing on current levels of political socialization and knowledge among high school students. This first section, in short, focuses on the civic education or political socialization of American students.

The next section, "Approaches to Studying the Politics of Education," deals with the politics of school governance. The three chapters that comprise the section, one by Terry Moe, another by Ames March and Johan Olsen, and the third by McDonnell and Stephen Weatherford, are interesting and thoughtful analyses of the institutional structure of education and the process of school politics, but this book may attempt to do too much by including them. Without them, the book is about the democratic purposes of education—how and why schools teach students to be citizens and the extent to which school practices facilitate that. With them, the book is not only about the democratic purposes of education, but also about school governance and politics, that is, the democratic functioning of education—a much broader, and I think too broad, topic.

From my perspective as an empiricist, the most interesting chapters are Conover and Searing's "A Political Socialization Perspective," in section 1, and Hochschild and Scovronick's "Democratic Education and the American Dream," in section 3. The former presents research findings on what we know about students' political knowledge and the latter presents evidence on the extent to which schools, and school practices, achieve educational equity.

Conover and Searing detail the findings of a study of 15 year olds in four kinds of communities across the United States. They found that most students lacked a clear sense of their future selves as adult citizens and tended to believe that being a good citizen requires only that one obey the law, vote, and act patriotically.

What is especially interesting for our understanding of how to politically socialize students is their analysis of the Hispanic community in San Antonio, Texas. There students lived in the midst of grassroots community organizing and were socialized into a citizen ethos that stressed the importance of community ties and loyalty to the nation. In a conscious effort to make its citizens into "super-Americans," this community instilled a deeper understanding of citizenship than did the other three communities. From these findings, the authors derive several sensible and creative recommendations on improving civic education so that students engage in active, rather than passive, political learning.

The final chapter, by Hochschild and Scovronick, skillfully summarizes the research on the extent to which specific educational strategies—school desegregation, equitable school funding, distinctive group treatment, school choice, and tracking-achieve educational equity, another democratic purpose of education. There are, unfortunately, several significant omissions in the works cited, including a number of important studies that do not fit the "politically correct" position, although the authors do note in the text that such positions exist. Their overall conclusion seems to be that these reforms have not achieved much educational equity, which they typically blame on administrative incompetence or venality or lack of public support. I would argue, however, that there is a serious possibility that we ask too much of the schools and the reforms. For one thing, in the first 18 years of life, children are in school only 13% of their waking hours. For another, although racial differences in achievement can theoretically be eliminated, class differences in achievement cannot in a world in which social class is not randomly assigned to individuals but is, at least in part, a result of differences in intellectual ability as defined by an elite. Indeed, our means of measuring intellectual ability-standardized achievement tests, years of schooling, and prestige of school-magnify rather than reduce racial and social class differences and are constantly refined to maintain these differences. Under such conditions, no reform should be expected to have more than a small impact on eliminating inequity, even before taking into consideration the possible incompetence of administrators and lack of public support for educational reforms.

Overall the research and theory presented in this volume are impressive, and the recommendations sensible and creative, but it seems to me that another very important question was not given proper attention. How do you get educators to care about teaching students to be better citizens when they are constantly criticized for low test scores and for failing to prepare students for a global economy? Perhaps, more importantly, how do you get the public to care about civic education when they feel that students are not attaining the skills needed for success in the marketplace? It strikes me that the public must be properly educated about the actual quality of American education-for example, the facts that standardized achievement tests are designed so that only half of all students can be reading at or above grade level no matter how excellent American education is and that not only are international tests misleading given the differences in population and curriculums, but there is no evidence of any connection between economic productivity and technological innovation, on the one hand, and a country's average score on an international test, on the other. Perhaps civic education will rise to the place of importance it should occupy in a country with an abysmally low rate of political participation and knowledge when the public is made aware of these facts.

The Political Party Matrix: The Persistence of Organization. By J. P. Monroe. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2001. 156p. $49.50 cloth, $16.95 paper.

Andrew J. Taylor, North Carolina State University

It used to be an axiom in political science that American parties were weak. Now we are not so sure. During the 1980s and 1990s, the profession produced a great deal of theoretical and empirical work suggesting that U.S. political parties were "resurgent." J. P. Monroe's book, The Political Party Matrix: The Persistence of Organization, provides an interesting twist on the new literature. It argues that party change is the result not so much of strengthening but of adaptation.

Specifically, Monroe uses interviews with campaign consultants, party chairs, and congressional and state legislative staffers from southern California conducted in the early 1990s to argue that political scientists have missed critical characteristics of the contemporary American party. Trained to apply rigidly the "bureaucratic model" to our thinking about parties, we inevitably see them currently as highly decentralized and amorphous institutions. This infers that they must be ineffective at accomplishing their objectives. Monroe offers a different way to conceptualize the party as organization, suggesting that it should be understood "in terms of the activities it performs, using this as a guide to its structure" (p. 29). In other words, we should utilize a party's critical functions and not least what E. E. Schattschneider considered the raison d'être, that is, winning elections—to drive our thinking about its physical appearance.

This leads Monroe to believe that "the parties' adaptive properties continue to make them effective agents in the political system" (p. ix). They are still tremendously proficient at electoral politics, but the personnel who undertake this task, because of our strict adherence to the bureaucratic model, are not conventionally thought of as being within the party. Consequently, political scientists incorrectly conclude that parties no longer dominate elections. According to Monroe, the dramatic rise of office budgets and member salaries at both the state legislative and the congressional levels has meant that the personal staff of lawmakers are the parties' new source of labor in the pursuit of electoral victory. These professional staff should therefore be thought of as an "informal" component of the party.

Monroe's data show that legislative staff form a candidate "farm league" for the party and work regularly on election activities for their patron's partisan colleagues as well as for the boss herself. The author also reveals that legislative staff cooperate with counterparts in the same party on casework, political issues, and outreach to community groups. This is collaborative work on behalf of the party undertaken by individuals generally believed to be "hired guns" working for self-interested and individualistic politicians.

The book's central problem is the theoretical wrapping in which the author ensconces the empirical work. It is simply too glittery and adorned with too nice a bow for its modest contents. Monroe uses a long and detailed discussion of the party resurgence literature—complete with excursions into comparative politics and the puzzling debate about how party organizations can have strengthened as the electorate has dealigned—as his starting point and clearly believes his work is a significant contribution to this important development in American politics. But when it comes down to it, interviews with and surveys of political staff in the Los Angeles area cannot really move the debate surrounding such "big" questions along very far. This same criticism can be aimed at the book's title. The Political Party Matrix—whatever that really means—is too grandiose for this study.

There are a few other theoretical problems, too. First, by choosing to focus on California, Monroe cannot really reject his null hypothesis that the personal staff of professional legislators are not replacing traditional personnel and organizational components in the performance of electoral functions for parties. California state legislators, with the exception of their counterparts in New York, have more personal staff than any other state legislators in the country. Moreover, because of the state's Progressive tradition, California parties are weak in the bureaucratic sense. It is no wonder, then, that Monroe found what he did in California. But for this development to be important, we need to see it elsewhere.

Second, this is essentially a study of party response and adaptation. As such it needs to describe the political party at points  $t_1$  and  $t_2$ , prove that it looks different at these two times, and then show that it has responded in the interim to some kind of exogenous stimulus. Monroe does a super job of showing us what the party looks like at  $t_2$ , but there is only a brief survey of the literature of the party at  $t_1$  (the "Golden Age of Politics" or his "party benchmark") and the external element (the modernization of politics, including the rise of the media and professionalization of legislative and campaign staff). In addition, there is so much distance between  $t_1$  and  $t_2$  (about 100 years) that any adaptation or change is inevitable. Perhaps the 1950s would have provided a better "benchmark" to reveal the magnitude of the parties' present adaptation.

It is the empirical part of the book that is the real contribution. As Monroe says, "The incumbents' enterprises-in-office, and more specifically the linkages created and maintained between them, are reshaping the political process in profound ways" (p. 97). He makes a strong case that the party is still doing the heavy lifting in campaigns, it is just doing it with different people. The next step is to take this argument further. A detailed look at the collaborative and partisan work undertaken by congressional staffers in Washington would be beneficial, for example. Such activity includes working with the parties' campaign committees, supporting and organizing fundraisers, and coordinating with presidential campaignssomething that has taken people around the country; recall the Republican staffers in Florida protesting recounts and wearing their "Sore-Loserman" buttons. Furthermore, the Bob Squiers, Frank Luntzs, and Richard Viguries of the world show that self-described "consultants" have become integral and permanent components of the political party. Such people also need to be brought into a more complete conceptualization of the new party structure.

Still, there is interesting material here for scholars of American political parties and Monroe's argument is important. The book is worth a look, even if its contents may have been more effectively presented in two or three journal articles.

Building a Legislative-Centered Public Administration: Congress and the Administrative State, 1946–1999. By David H. Rosenbloom. Tuscaloosa: The University of Alabama Press, 2000. 199p. $34.95 cloth.

John S. Robey, University of Texas at Brownsville

In 1946, Congress passed the Administrative Procedure and Legislative Reorganization Act. In this legislation, Congress purposefully provided for itself a prominent role in the administration of the federal government. David Rosenbloom writes that the "... purpose of this book is to explain how and why Congress adopted that role, its underlying coherence, [and] its durability . . . for seemingly ever-increasing congressional involvement in federal administration... (p. ix). The author maintains that Congress was uneasy about this endeavor but was forced by the "federal administrative state" to reposition itself. Some even believed that Congress' place in the constitutional scheme-of-things had been altered. For example, it was asserted that Congress was abandoning constitutional principle if it allowed unelected governmental administrators to make rules (i.e., administrative law). The 1946 legislation has resulted in a merger between Congress and the federal bureaucracy. The author contends that federal agencies became "extensions" of Congress' authority to make law. In addition, this legislation resulted in the view that the administration of the bureaucracy was no longer to be seen as the private preserve of the executive branch of government. The concept of "legislative-centered public administration" is used to describe the results of this legislation.

Congress very reluctantly accepted the rise of technocrats. The growing complexity of many public policies gave it no choice but to share policy-making power. Rule making became a common way for Congress to delegate to federal agencies the authority to make policy. To retain some control, however, Congress provided that it would have supervisory authority over many of these agencies on an ongoing basis. The result of this decision has been "legislative-centered public administration." The cooperative effort by legislators and federal administrators to make policy has not always been peaceful. There has been conflict, for example, over the administrator's values of efficiency and economy and political/legislative needs for openness and responsiveness. The author maintains that the critics of Congressional oversight wrongfully charge that Congress "micromanages." To demonstrate the development of legislativecentered public administration, Rosenbloom presents the reader with an analysis of an alternative view of policy making, or what he calls the "legislative process by other means.

Federal agencies had traditionally been looked upon as the implementers of public policy. They were allowed some discretion in the implementation of law, but they were not policy makers. With the passage of the 1946 legislation, there evolved a "... collective understanding by Congress that because agencies exercise legislative powers to regulate the economy and society, they should be considered as adjuncts" (p. 21). It followed that Congress should specify how "... legislation by other means—that is administration—should work" (p. 21). The author defends legislative-centered public administration as "... the only deliberate answer the nation has tried..." (p. 155) to answer the question, What is the correct role for Congress in the administration of the federal government?

Professor Rosenbloom is critical of those who view public administration as a "business endeavor" that should be controlled by the President and his cabinet. He contends that one supporter of this view was Al Gore, who championed liberating agencies from Congressional "micromanagement" in his National Performance Review. Legislative-centered public administration rejects the politics-administration dichotomy. Rosenbloom writes, "There is no politics-administration dichotomy. Nor can constitutional structure and procedure be separated from administration. Public administration includes legislative functions..." (p. 58). Legislative-centered public administration also views governmental oversight more positively. The "executive-centered" public management model viewed much public reporting as time-consuming, inefficient, and meddlesome. Legislative-centered administration sees legislative intervention and reporting requirements "...in the federal agency decision making process as producing, rather than encumbering, proper results" (p. 102).

Rosenbloom contends that one of the results of legislativecentered administration has been the adoption of legislative values (i.e., openness, public accountability, representativeness, and responsiveness) by many public agencies. Another result has been the transfer of much constituency work from Congress to the agencies. When the Legislative Reorganization Act was passed, some members of Congress complained that three-fourths of their time was spent running errands for constituents. To solve this problem, Congress transferred "...some particularly unproductive forms of constituency service and infrastructure decision making to the agencies" (p. 105). The purpose of this was to make Congress more efficient and to strengthen it as an institution. Professor Rosenbloom contends that it has worked so well that, over time, the role of the agencies regarding constituency service has become even more important.

In the last chapter, the author provides a listing of the major principles of legislative-centered public administration (e.g., "administration involves legislative functions)" as well as an analysis of legislative-centered public administration and its relationship with the principle of separation of powers. He also ties together arguments that were made in previous chapters so that logical relationships and connections are made between the topics that were addressed.

This text contains an interesting and well-documented and reasoned analysis of the evolution of Congressional/federal agencies relationships for the last half of the twentieth century. The author skillfully presents the rationale for viewing the structure of the federal government from a less rigid perspective than the traditional executive-judicial-legislative point of view. Although the arguments are thoughtfully presented, none of the author's propositions is ever quantified or empirically tested in any way. This is a volume that should be of interest to a wide variety of academics and practitioners. Students of Congress, public administration, and public policy analysis, as well as scholars of modern public history, will all find the volume to be a valuable addition to their library. Those desiring a more rigorous (i.e., quantitative) analysis of the topics presented may wish to pass on the volume. It is recommended for those who value a fresh and well-reasoned descriptive analysis of an important aspect of the evolution of the modern administrative state.

The Postmodern Presidency: Bill Clinton's Legacy in U.S. Politics. Edited by Steven E. Schier. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 2000. 304p. $45.00.

Shirley Anne Warshaw, Gettysburg College

Steven E. Schier's latest book, The Postmodern Presidency: Bill Clinton's Legacy in U.S. Politics, provides a much-needed assessment of the Clinton presidency. Throughout the eight years of the Clinton administration, surprisingly few scholarly books were written that either assessed presidential performance or examined the political implications of the Clinton presidency. The few books that did emerge from the Clinton era focus on impeachment and on Mrs. Clinton, most in a less than scholarly way. Steven Schier has begun to fill this scholarly void by putting together an edited volume that examines both performance and political repercussions of the Clinton presidency. This volume of 12 articles offers perspectives on the domestic, international, and economic policies of the administration. The contributors are all well-known scholars in presidential research and all have written significantly within their fields (i.e., domestic policy, international relations, electoral politics, etc.). Schier's choice of contributors is excellent and ensures substantial command of the subject matter within the chapters.

Schier approaches the Clinton presidency from the view-point of politics as he seeks to explain whether the Clinton presidency had an impact "on the future of American politics and public policy" (p. 15). Each of the essays in the volume offers a varying perspective, with no clear consensus reached. The volume is divided into four broad parts. The first part includes three essays on the institutional presidency and its impact on economic and foreign policy. Following the institutional presidency chapters are three essays on the mobilization of public opinion to support presidential positions. Three more chapters are devoted to electoral politics, and the final three chapters provide a rather broad look at "the culture war" in which Clinton engaged, as Schier calls it (p. 16).

The theme of politics is examined partly through the lens of Steven Skowronek's theme in The Politics Presidents Make (1993), in which the argument is made that presidents try to construct some "new political arrangements that can stand the test of legitimacy with other institutions" of government (pp. 20-21). Schier asks whether Clinton was able to construct new political relationships as a means to forge new institutional relationships. In other words, could Clinton construct new relationships with Congress, with state and local government, with the Democratic Party, and with other nations that were productive to his policy goals? The question is particularly relevant given the constraints of 12 years of Republican control of the White House (Reagan-Bush) in which smaller government, increased state programmatic control, and greater defense spending were the watchwords. Schier's answer is yes, Clinton was flexible and able to alter his governing style and his political relationships as the climate demanded. He was forced, in his first two years in office, to construct a political coalition that moved his domestic and economic programs forward, as defined by his 1992 campaign. During the remainder of his term, as the Republicans gained control of Congress, he was forced to develop completely new political alignments and new policy goals within the confines of such new alignments. Thus Schier neatly provides a broad array of substantive support for his central theme that Clinton was able to move policy forward in spite of a series of political roadblocks. These roadblocks were overcome as Clinton constructed variations on his policy positions to satisfy the shifting political coalitions he dealt with throughout his eight years in office.

I have two comments on the direction this book takes. First, not all of the 12 essays provide a clear and concise statement of Schier's theme. Some of the essays seem to be pulled from other venues and incorporated into the volume. It would be helpful if each essay established quite succinctly how Clinton's political relationships influenced the policies at hand. Second, the final section, on culture wars, seems somewhat out of character with the theme of the book. While racial issues and gender issues are an important part of the Clinton policy legacy, there is little within the three essays on these subjects in this volume to tie them to the other chapters. Perhaps they should have been incorporated into the domestic policy section—but even then there appears to be a lack of continuity within the thematic base.

In summary, I would commend this book for audiences on the presidency and American politics in general, with regard both to leadership and to institutional issues. Schier has provided a well-grounded analysis of this rare two-term presidency, concluding that Clinton regularly refocused his broad goals within a changing political climate. Schier also notes that Clinton never lost his core policy goals in spite of broad refocusing and thus meets Skowronek's test of a preemptive president. This volume should spark considerable discussion of Clinton's meeting the test of a preemptive president, as other volumes seek to agree or disagree with Schier's central theme.

Constitutional Process: A Social Choice Analysis of Supreme Court Decision Making. By Maxwell L. Stearns. Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press, 2000. 420p. $65.00.

Timothy M. Hagle, University of Iowa

A not uncommon complaint concerning social choice models is that they tend to assume away everything of interest, leaving a model with little relation to the real world. The usual response is that one must start with the basic elements of a problem before moving to more complex and inclusive models. Unfortunately, few social choice models applied to legal studies have achieved sufficient complexity to be of significant value. Maxwell Stearns recognizes this problem and, in Constitutional Process, systematically presents a comprehensive social choice model and applies it to a complex legal doctrine.

The process of introducing, explaining, and applying the model makes Constitutional Process an integrated book whose six main chapters form a definite progression that must be followed from beginning to end. The introductory chapter presents the problem: cases that are considered anomalies in terms of legal doctrine. After a detailed description of these cases, chapter 2 presents the basics of social choice theory. Stearns starts with fundamental notions of rationality, progresses to the voting paradox, Condorcet winners, and three fallacies of social choice, and ends with a presentation of Arrow's theorem. In Part II (chapters 3 and 4), Stearns first examines several individual cases in the context of social choice. The goal is to identify and examine the decisional rules used by the justices to cope with, for example, potential intransitivities and issue multidimensionality. He terms this "static constitutional process." Chapter 4 carries the analysis forward to the consideration of an entire legal doctrine, which he terms "dynamic constitutional process." Stearns uses the legal doctrine of standing to illustrate the social choice model he is developing. In Part III (chapters 5 and 6), he provides a fuller examination of standing and tests his social choice model using the standing cases of the Burger and Rehnquist Courts.

It is important to emphasize that Stearns does test his model. He approaches social choice from a scientific viewpoint. For social choice analysis to be of value to legal scholars as well as political scientists, it must explain more than current constitutional or political approaches to court decisions. By beginning with detailed descriptions of cases considered anomalies under prevailing constitutional doctrine, he lays the groundwork for the later test of his model. He then works to expand our overall understanding of the Supreme Court and its decision-making process by explaining these cases in a social choice context.

Even so, there are some difficulties with the analysis. Stearns first faces a dilemma in how much weight to give the opinions written by the justices. Legal scholars may give great weight to the opinions, while political scientists may be more likely to see them as rationalizations for the justices' votes. Stearns recognizes this problem and indicates that although the opinions should be taken seriously, they nevertheless cannot be taken at face value. Despite this recognition of the potentially self-serving nature of opinions, an argument can be made that Stearns relies a bit too heavily on them. Moreover, some of the anomalous cases may be the result of a somewhat selective reading of the opinions.

For example, Stearns' analysis of Kassel v. Consolidated Freightways, 450 U.S. 662 (1981), suggests that an anomaly occurs when one considers the two issues in the case: whether to apply a rational basis or a balancing test and whether evidence not considered by the Iowa legislature when drafting the regulation can be admitted at trial. On an issue-by-issue basis, Stearns argues, the regulation should have been upheld. Five of the justices thought rational basis to be the appropriate test, and a different six that the additional evidence should be allowed. These are the two conditions required for the regulation to have been upheld, and separate majorities supported each, but the regulation was overturned because only three justices took the position satisfying both conditions. Arguably, the perceived anomaly was the result of Justice Brennan's opinion, which suggests that the rational basis test is appropriate, but new evidence should not be allowed. On closer examination, however, one might be inclined to discount this interpretation of Justice Brennan's opinion. Although Justice Brennan mentions rationality twice, each instance is in relation to the purposes of the legislature. At the same time, Justice Brennan twice mentions that the Court must balance the burdens imposed on commerce with local benefits. Thus, one could read Justice Brennan's opinion as applying the rational basis test at one stage and the balancing test at another. Moreover, Justice Brennan also indicates that a third question to be asked is whether the regulation at issue is protectionist. If so—and he finds that it is—then even a balance in favor of local safety will not save it. Thus, rather than a bidimensional analysis that produces an anomaly, perhaps there are three dimensions to the case.

Similar criticisms could be raised regarding the approach to the other cases selected as anomalies, but such concerns do not significantly detract from Stearns' overall argument. His systematic analysis argues that cycling in individual cases is avoided by outcome voting (as opposed to issue voting). Although this sometimes produces doctrinal anomalies, these are minimized through the use of stare decisis. Stare decisis, in turn, invites ideological litigant path manipulation, which is minimized through the use of doctrines such as standing. In applying a social choice model to Supreme Court decision making, Stearns provides an explanation of the doctrines adopted to cope with vote cycling and related problems at several stages in the process. Those who study judicial politics have long recognized that the justices act strategically. Stearns has taken this a step further by demonstrating that not only do the justices act strategically, but they do so in ways that both avoid vote cycling problems and preserve the legitimacy of the Supreme Court's decision making.

From the Puritans to the Projects: Public Housing and Public Neighbors. By Lawrence J. Vale. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2000. 460p. $45.00.

R. Allen Hays, University of Northern Lowa

There is an unfortunate tendency for much public policy analysis to be ahistorical in its perspective. A program or policy is evaluated in terms of its success or failure in achieving its stated goals, and only the most immediate social, political, and economic factors are brought into the analysis to explain policy outcomes. In the case of public housing in the United States, an analysis of its failure to meet its stated goal of providing decent housing for the poor might lead us to blame (1) the federal government for poor design of the program,

(2) local governments for poor implementation, or (3) the recipients themselves for engaging in antisocial behavior that undermined the intent of the program.

Lawrence Vale's brilliant analysis of the development of public housing in Boston clearly reveals how limited and inaccurate such conclusions would be. To be sure, all of these actors have contributed to the problems of public housing, but Vale's work shows how their roles were played out in a much broader and deeper historical context, the roots of which can be traced to the earliest European settlers in North America. He shows that the failure of public housing is rooted in cultural attitudes toward the poor that have made it extremely difficult to develop rational and humane programs to meet their needs.

The central dilemma in dealing with the poor is what sort of aid society is obligated to provide them and who among them is most deserving of such aid. The individualistic values that support capitalism tell us that each individual is responsible for his/her economic fate and that each of us should evaluate his or her personal worth in terms of economic success. However, Americans have been reluctant to leave the poor entirely to their own devices for three reasons. The first two are pragmatic: (1) It is obvious that many people become poor for reasons not in their control (i.e., sickness, layoffs) and (2) chronically deprived persons trying desperately to survive may threaten social stability. The third reason is a moral imperative to help the less fortunate that is rooted in the Judeo-Christian tradition.

Beginning with the Puritans who founded Boston, Vale traces the contradictions in public policy toward the poor that these conflicting values produced. Because he is dealing with housing, which necessarily involves the allocation of physical space, he focuses, in particular, on the spatial dimensions of the treatment of the poor. He argues that public housing, like the almshouses that preceded it, "encodes" society's conflicting attitudes in its distribution of physical space to the poor.

Vale tells us that in seventeenth- and eighteenth-century Boston, as elsewhere in America, the poor were divided into two groups. The "deserving" poor (for example widows) were considered legitimate members of the community and were given relief in their own homes ("outdoor relief," in the terminology of the times). The "undeserving" poor (for example, itinerant laborers or alcoholics) were isolated in an almshouse ("indoor relief"), where they would not contaminate the rest of society. As Boston expanded, the almshouse was pushed farther and farther toward the periphery of the community, since no residents wanted to compromise their own social status by living next to it. In the mid-nineteenth century, almshouses took on another responsibility, that of "reforming" the poor through work and discipline, in hopes of returning them to society as productive workers.

As another antecedent to public housing, Vale traces the development of environmental and architectural determinism in American values. From Thomas Jefferson's belief in the virtue of the yeoman farmer to the Homestead Act's creation of individual plots of land for settlers, Americans have tended to assume that where one lives shapes how one lives. This idea influenced the development of the residential rings that grew around American cities in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Single-family houses located on individual plots of land were viewed as encouraging positive family values. At the same time, however, living in such areas was also seen as a reward for families who already possessed the values these developments were said to encourage. People who deviated from these norms were considered unacceptable neighbors.

The private housing industry fought long and hard to keep the federal government out of the provision of housing, but when the Great Depression finally provided sufficient impetus for the creation of a federal program, its implementation clearly reflected the values Vale describes. It its early years in Boston, occupancy of public housing was seen as a reward to be given only to the most deserving poor. Careful screening of applicants was aimed at keeping out "undesirables," and many public housing complexes were sought-after residences for people of modest income. Architects tried to design public housing in ways they thought would further enhance the virtue of those living there.

Vale's account goes on to show how the role of public housing began to change after World War II. The rapid growth of suburbia created affordable housing for many of the white working-class families that had once occupied public housing. Moreover, the massive destruction of low-income neighborhoods by urban renewal flooded public housing with the more desperately poor, and screening of applicants ceased. Finally, low-income African Americans, excluded from the suburbs by discrimination, became increasingly ghettoized in public housing. In the face of these changes, public housing ceased to be a reward for the deserving poor and became a reservation for people considered undesirable by the rest of society. This new reservation status contributed greatly to its decline, to the point where many public housing projects are now being demolished.

Vale is clearly critical of the way the poor have been treated in American society, but if his analysis has a flaw, it is that he does not articulate an alternative vision of how the housing needs of the poor might have been addressed more justly. I am not suggesting that he should have provided "policy recommendations" for that is clearly beyond the scope of a historical work. Rather, the articulation of an alternative set of values that would result in more just treatment of the poor as legitimate members of society would have made it clearer what yardstick he was using to measure the failings of the policies that did emerge.

On balance, however, Vale's work is an extremely insightful historical analysis that deepens our understanding of how flawed public policies emerge. It well deserves the award it received from the Urban Affairs Association as the Best Book in Urban Politics of the Year.

Legislative Entrepreneurship in the U.S. House of Representatives. By Gregory Wawro. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2000. 193p. $39.50 cloth, $19.95 paper.

Sean M. Theriault, University of Texas at Austin

Why would any legislator in the U.S. House of Representatives invest the time and energy to pass good public policy? This simple question drives Gregory Wawro's investigation of legislative entrepreneurship, which he defines as "invest[ing] time, staff, and other resources to acquire knowledge of particular policy areas, draft[ing] legislation addressing issues in those areas, and shepherd[ing] their proposals through the legislative process by building and maintaining coalitions" (p. 2). His introduction and description of the puzzle are exemplary. His answer, unfortunately, is wanting.

Wawro finds either nonexistent or weak results when he investigates the relationship between constituents and legislative entrepreneurs. Again, he reports nonfindings for the relationship between political action committee campaign contributions and legislative entrepreneurship. Only in the chapter where he investigates the connection between advancement in either political parties or committees are legislative entrepreneurs rewarded. When representatives need to fill committee or party leadership positions, Wawro finds that they turn systematically more often to legislative entrepreneurs. This robust finding is consistent across parties.

To introduce the subject of legislative entrepreneurship, Wawro describes, among others, Representative Dick Armey's early legislative accomplishments. In the conclusion, he returns to Armey's career to show, anecdotally, how his investigation rings true with our current political situation. Throughout the book, Wawro stays true to the question and politics as practiced in modern America. As such, his book—even when describing the minutia of statistical procedures—is an enjoyable and provocative read.

Chapter 6 most forcefully illustrates this strength. After completing the more rigorous statistical analysis, Wawro analyzes his theory and results in light of the Republican takeover in 1994. Again, anecdotally, he shows how legislative entrepreneurship can account for party and committee leader selection. That his argument works under a different regime is important; however, the most impressive thing about this chapter is Wawro's concern for the real-world application of his argument.

Wawro's question and his concern for explaining political realities are the book's biggest strength. Its biggest weakness is the nonfindings that pervade most of the tables. Wawro is careful to embed his study in the long tradition of explaining congressional behavior by starting with the assumption made popular by David Mayhew (1975), in Congress: The Electoral Connection, that members of Congress are singleminded seekers of reelection. Yet when he explores the connection between reelection and legislative entrepreneurship, he comes up shooting mostly blanks.

Three explanations could account for the absence of a relationship between reelection and entrepreneurship. First, quite simply, there is no relationship between the two. Second, the relationship is confounding and contradictory. In sketching out his argument, Wawro outlines two arguments with opposite predictions. Constituents could either punish legislative entrepreneurs for taking controversial stands and trading off case work with legislation (àla Fiorina, in Congress: Keystone to the Washington Establishment, 1977) or reward them for being important legislative players. These two explanations could cancel each other out by being equally powerful and offsetting.

Third, Wawro's operationalization of legislative entrepreneurship or the specification of his multivariate regressions may be inadequate to uncover the true relationship. With regard to the former, his comprehensive tables and extensive footnotes indicate that he considered many other functional forms. If a positive relationship between entrepreneurship and reelection exists—as I suspect—the nonfinding culprit must be the operationalization of legislative entrepreneurship.

Rather than pan Wawro for his measure of entrepreneurship, I praise him for putting something on the table. He develops an "entrepreneurship scales score" based on five independent measures: the average numbers of cosponsors, leadership cosponsors, titles, and index terms for each member's introduced bills and policy knowledge scores based on the number of testimonies the member has in committees. Admittedly, his measure is not perfect; but it provides congressional scholars with a starting point to quantify and to analyze, rigorously, the rather complex concept of "legislative entrepreneurship."

Early on in the book, Wawro explains that his investigation is going to be concerned with legislative entrepreneurship as an independent variable. This direct approach leaves unanswered, perhaps, some of the most interesting questions. With null findings on the consequences of entrepreneurship, an investigation of the causes becomes all that more important. If part of that answer leads us to the representative's district (àla Fenno's Home Style, 1978), we might begin to discover a more complete answer to Wawro's question.

In the end, the reader is asked to believe that legislative entrepreneurship is worth it for members because it increases their probability of obtaining committee and party leadership positions. A more complete examination would, in turn, impact this finding with the propensity of securing reelection. If this connection is true, what would propel some member to eschew more traditional reelection activities (such as gaining pork and servicing constituent case work) to engage in entrepreneurship? I look forward to reading part II of this research program, whether from Wawro's pen or someone else's.

The demand for a book to be both path breaking and conclusive is too high. Wawro's contributes mightily to the first of these. Legislative Entrepreneurship in the U.S. House of Representatives is a must read for anyone doing research on Congress. Although he does not resolve many major debates in the field of Congressional research, Wawro's evidence certainly impacts some of the most important debates about the institutions of Congress. Wawro's clear thinking and writing make this a good read also for those doing sophisticated quantitative methods—perhaps it is even better for those just beginning more formal training in econometrics. His multivariate analysis tool chest-including probits, instrumental variables, simultaneous equations, maximum likelihood equations, and ordered probits—provides quality examples of modifications and alternatives to ordinary least squares (OLS). He is careful to explain why he employs these various corrections or alternatives to OLS.

Wawro's findings are important for all of American politics and political science at large, but the preponderance of inconclusive findings probably makes reading an article version of his argument both cheaper and a more efficient use of time for those not explicitly interesting in congressional questions.

Racialized Coverage of Congress: The News in Black and White. By Jeremy Zilber and David Niven. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2000. 160p. $60.00.

C. Richard Hofstetter, San Diego State University

Jeremy Zilber and David Niven bolster a brief but cogent argument with evidence that news coverage of Congress has been "racialized" to the detriment of African-American congressmen and congresswomen, that African-American members of Congress are less favorably portrayed, less likely to be associated with a diverse agenda, and portrayed as more marginal than Caucasian members, factors other than race being equal (p. 90). By implication, the argument extends to all minority political activists and public officials. It also implies that constituencies represented by African-American politicians are greatly disadvantaged in the political process.

Written in an engaging style and using a multimethod approach, the study presents data from several perspectives and purports to show how coverage works against the personal and political interests of African-American members of Congress. Noting that the existence of dramatic racial differences between whites and African Americans in public opinion and political power poses a problem in America, the authors argue that the news media have contributed to the situation. News media "racialize" coverage of African-American politicians by nearly always highlighting race and emphasizing how they differ from white counterparts. Zilber and Niven organize the book around three themes: (1) the extent of news racialization concerning members of Congress, (2) the causes of racialized news coverage, and (3) the effects of racialization.

Content analysis of 1998 news coverage of three groups of members of Congress was conducted: 20 African-American members of Congress, 20 white Congressmen with "similar ideology" (liberal) and service, and 20 white Congressmen selected to represent the entire Congress who tend toward conservative and Republican dispositions (pp. 18–23). Up to 10 articles (N=2524) "focusing on" the 60 members of Congress from major newspapers were selected for analysis during 1993–1999. When more than 10 articles about a Congressman appeared, 20% but no fewer than 10 were randomly selected.

Analysis revealed that no large differences in news coverage appeared among the three groups in number, length, or placement of articles (p. 23), but coverage of race was a different matter. The race of African-American members was stressed consistently compared to the white groups, whether it was mentioned in connection to the member or about an issue position implying that African American politicians are concerned solely with African American issues and constituents, rather than national issues and collective concerns. Coverage is also more locally oriented, failing to link members with national and international issues or with bases of power and leadership roles in Congress, and considerably more negative in tone

Zilber and Niven conducted interviews with press secretaries and content analyzed member web sites to examine how members present themselves and the concerns they wish to stress. Despite common aspirations in how members wanted to be covered by the media, press secretaries for African-American members were much more likely to report unfavorable treatment, for instance, not being taken seriously, ignoring actions, and negative stereotyping, at the hands of the press than press secretaries for other members (p. 54). However, African American's web sites were much more likely to highlight civil rights, education, human rights, and poverty.

Drawing data from two survey samples of reporters who cover Congress, one of 100 political reporters and another of 10 reporters who were intensively interviewed, Zilber and Niven found support for a "distribution effect" that influences the content of what is reported about African-American members of Congress and may be a prime mover in racialization. The low number of African-American members of Congress influences news coverage; the commonly held view of disparity in race between reporters and members does not. Reporters from areas with few African Americans provide less favorable coverage (p. 91). Lack of familiarity may breed an unfavorable image of African-American members of Congress, if not contempt.

Analyses of 1994, 1996, and 1998 NES survey data from Congressional districts in which the 60 sampled politicians reside provide support for a "racial priming" hypothesis that white voters provide higher approval for Caucasian candidates, while African-American voters provide equal approval for African-American and Caucasian candidates. These dispositions parallel racialized coverage that incumbents receive bolstering the image of Caucasian politicians but undermining the image of African-American candidates, thus working to the detriment of African Americans who challenge Caucasian opponents (p. 102).

Zilber and Niven conclude that reports of racial issues coupled with the racial identities of African-American candidates alienate Caucasian voters and help to keep African-American politicians out of higher office (p. 113). The very sensitivity to diversity issues that appears in news coverage makes the racialized coverage worse. News will improve only when racial identification of minorities is reduced. They recommend that reporters permit politicians to speak for themselves rather than over interpret positions and that politicians should selectively punish reporters who identify race when unwarranted.

This thin volume by no means exhausts research on the question of adequate coverage. It has limitations in the scope of questions raised, breadth of data, and little multivariate analysis. It does, however, provide a near-textbook job of posing intriguing theoretical questions, collecting and applying data to answer these questions in a direct and relevant manner, and eliminating many of the most likely alternative explanations for what is observed. Zilber and Niven's work would be of particular interest to those interested in racial politics, news media coverage of politics, and political behavior. It contributes to a research agenda about the coverage of minority officials by raising questions and suggesting requisites for analysis in studying media coverage. It skillfully demonstrates the utility of a multimethod approach by drawing on various kinds of data to study the role of communication media in political behavior. Like all good research it raises important questions that beg further study.

Comparative Politics

Communities and the Environment: Ethnicity, Gender, and the State in Community-Based Conservation. Edited by Arun Agrawal and Clark C. Gibson. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2001. 232p. $60.00 cloth, $23.00 paper.

Pamela Stricker, California State University, San Marcos

Common pool (or property) resource studies attempt to address the puzzle of managing natural resources highlighted by Garrett Hardin's (1968) Tragedy of the Commons dilemma. In that scenario of an unmanaged commons, a resource (e.g., pasture) made available to a multiplicity of users will result in a free-for-all leading to the destruction of that natural resource. Traditionally, solutions to this resource overuse problem have come in the form of privatization or state control of natural resources.

Within the property rights regime, rights can be assigned to an individual via private property rights, or to the state through the use of public lands, or to a collection of individuals, usually a "community," through common property rights. However, the latter option has become problematic in the view of the editors and contributors of this edition, due to the treatment of community as homogeneous.

In a thought-provoking volume of case studies from the Global South, Arun Agrawal and Clark Gibson have delved into how governments have gone astray in decentralizing natural resource management. Knowingly or not, many policymakers have, in their bid to return control of a given area's resources back to the local inhabitants, shaped the results of the devolution policy by allowing outdated conceptualizations of "community" to inform the manner in which they distributed this political power.

The editors and their contributors have put forth, for the most part, a convincing argument backed up by the empirical data outlined in the six cases from Africa, South Asia, and North America for a more nuanced conceptualization of "community." They posit that the outmoded definition of community "as a small spatial unit, social structure, and set of shared norms" stymies meaningful decentralization of political power vis-à-vis full participation of all members of the subgroups within a given "community" over a particular body of natural resources.

Calling for a shift in perspective to one that considers divergent interests of multiple actors as well as consideration of the processes through which these interests are expressed, along with analysis of the institutions that affect these political outcomes, the authors collectively set forth a new set of criteria for natural resource management devolution programs.

Additionally, in their cases the contributors call on policymakers to factor in the diversity within the populations, be it gender, ethnicity, religion, class, or other identifiable subgroup category, when structuring what such policies will look like "on the ground." A particularly interesting chapter (chapter 2) analyzes the problematic nature of crafting policymaking with gender concerns in mind. Many of those approaches have been colored by shortcomings in resource management concerns such as how traditional norms frame gendered relations of land access and ownership, but also how contemporary analyses have too frequently overlooked subgroup differentiation as in the intricacies of how caste, class, and ethnicity affect how both women and men utilize natural resources.

Also illustrative of the need for rethinking of "community" is Bettina Ng'Weno's chapter on Kenyan natural resource conservation. Government efforts to conserve more than half of the nation's rare plants were cloaked in the "mythic indigenous preservation model" that fell short of the conservation plans given the multiple interpretations of the sacredness of the kaya (coastal forested areas) as well as the not so homogenous nature of the Mijikenda or the subgroup Muslim Digo peoples.

Other contributors examine how differing social structures and relationships within communities and government representatives can affect natural resource conservation in Morocco (chapter 3) and Indonesia (chapter 6), respectively. Hughes McDermott's examination of the Philippine government's conflicted definition of community in forest management programs in Palawan is well crafted. This case dramatizes how networks can offer indigenous peoples support in their efforts to overcome the legacies of colonial pasts and resource control of authoritarian elites.

Community control of natural resources can reveal class, ethnic, religious, or gender lines. Resources will be controlled by elites who dominate these communities if the state simply passes the resource management baton to the local governing structure and turns its attention back to the capital. The state's role in ensuring that natural resource conservation takes place requires a consciousness on the part of the state of the various subgroups in the community as well as the political, economic, and social hierarchies existent in a given locus. Neither the editors nor the contributors fully answer the question raised by this proposed multiactor conceptualization of community. If a state is cognizant of the various players and their particular characteristics and the social, political, and economic hierarchies that underpin a community's governance (thus shaping the distribution of natural resources), then how far should the state go in the facilitation of democratic or equalitarian distribution of the resources so that a cohesive plan of management can be enacted? A conclusion drawing together the lessons of these cases and outlining how states could update their conceptualization of community based on the concerns raised would have strengthened this otherwise solid edition.

Nonetheless, Communities and the Environment takes the common pool resources literature as well as the practice of managing the commons in an important new direction, a locally informed multilayered one. This volume calls on academics and practitioners alike to recognize the various members and their identities, actions, and access to participating in the design and implementation of conservation policies. While the book does not broadly guide states into that new direction, it sets forth a significant challenge to government policymakers and practitioners to factor in the multiplicity of interests and potential participants in community-based conservation programs. Further, it helps us get at the underlying conflicts underpinning many decentralized resource conservation programs that have been designed to limit the powerless from seeking to expand their demands in contested areas of valuable resources, fertile land, irrigation access, and, most importantly, political and economic power.

Bounded Missions: Military Regimes and Democratization in the Southern Cone and Brazil. By Craig L. Arceneaux. University Park: Pennsylvania State Press, 2001. 262p. $35.00.

Harold A. Trinkunas, Naval Postgraduate School

This book provides a solid contribution to our understanding of regime transitions, although from an unusual perspective: that of the armed forces of an outgoing dictatorship. Since its inception, the literature on democratization has argued that modes of regime transition (and the actors empowered during this process) have a substantial impact on the success and quality of a new democracy. Craig Arceneaux's central insight is that who retains control of the process in a transition from a military dictatorship depends to a great degree on the cohesion of the armed forces and the coherence of their economic and political strategy. To establish this proposition, Arceneaux adopts an institutionalist approach to examine five cases of transition in South America, all drawn from the period of prolonged military rule that characterized the region during the 1960s and 1970s.

At least since the seminal work on democratization by Guillermo O'Donnell and Philippe C. Schmitter (Transitions from Authoritarian Rule, 1986), political scientists have noted a strong relationship between the issue of who is empowered by a political transition and the quality and quantity of democracy available in a new regime. Where the security forces are able to maintain control over the timing and sequence of the transition process, they are often able to embed checks on the power of elected officials into the institutions a new democracy. Commonly, these constraints are aimed at protecting members of the armed forces from prosecution for human rights abuses committed during a dictatorship, but they can also be designed to preserve institutional prerogatives and might even include limits on budgetary and economic policy, as in the case of post-Pinochet Chile. In the long run, the persistence of military-backed limits on the power of elected officials calls into question the very degree to which a regime can be considered democratic.

In this book, Arceneaux seeks to understand the circumstances in which the armed forces are able to carry out a controlled transition following a period in which they had directly ruled a country. He argues that two factors, military unity and strategy coordination, increase the likelihood that a military regime will succeed in controlling a transition. Arceneaux defines military unity in relation to the ability of the armed forces to maintain cohesion in the face of the challenges of participating in a military dictatorship; strategy coordination refers to the ability of a military regime to develop a successful and effective government program that achieves support from important social and political actors. Where both factors are high, he argues that we should expect to see armed forces that retain control over transitions to democracy and are able successfully to defend institutional privileges in a new regime. In other words, where the armed forces have remained internally cohesive and authoritarian regimes are perceived as successful by the larger society, we should expect that the institutions of a new democracy should be strongly influenced by the preferences of the outgoing military government.

Arceneaux adopts an explicitly historical institutionalist approach to explaining military success and failure in achieving transition control. In this book, variation in the two independent variables is largely a product of the institutional rules of the game of the authoritarian regime, which means that transition control is largely predetermined even before the actual process of moving to a new regime begins. As Arceneaux correctly reminds us, all military dictatorships are caught on the horns of a dilemma: Greater direct participation in government increases the stake of the armed forces in a dictatorship's success (and their willingness to defend it), but such participation also politicizes the armed forces and reduces their ability to coordinate political and economic strategies that are likely to lead to regime success. Arceneaux finds that the ability of a military government to manage this dilemma successfully is a product of its internal institutional arrangements.

In each of the five authoritarian regimes examined in this book (Argentina, 1966-73; Argentina, 1976-83; Brazil, 1964-85; Chile, 1973-89; Uruguay, 1973-85), Arceneaux conducts a detailed analysis of the "rules of the game," and he successfully shows how variations in these rules affected the ability of the armed forces to maintain high levels of unity and strategy coordination. At one extreme, the institutional arrangements developed during the Pinochet regime sustained high levels of military unity and led to successful strategies that allowed the armed forces to place numerous constraints on the power of democratically elected Aylwin administration following the 1990 transition. On the other hand, the Argentine armed forces' thorough penetration of the state apparatus during the 1976-83 dictatorship politicized the officer corps and produced internal conflicts over strategy, leading to poor decision making that eventually plunged the country into an unwinnable war with Great Britain in 1982. The resulting disarray in the armed forces initially placed them in a very weak position vis-à-vis the democratic government that followed. An interesting intermediate case is that of the military-backed "Argentine Revolution" (1966-73), where even though military institutional unity was sustained by excluding the bulk of the officer corps from a day-to-day role in government, poor strategy coordination led to a worsening economic and social crisis and the collapse of the regime. Given the paucity of studies focusing on this level of analysis of authoritarian regimes, each of the country cases analyzed in this book represents a valuable contribution in and of itself to our understanding of this period in Latin American politics.

However, the almost-exclusive focus on the institutional level as a source of explanation is also one of the few drawbacks of this book. By concentrating in such detail on the organizational arrangements and decision making processes within each of the dictatorships, Arceneaux dedicates little space to addressing the impact on his variables of external shocks, such as changes in world economic conditions. Also, given his attention to the success or failure of strategy coordination in military governments, the absence of substantial discussion of counterstrategies pursued by their opponents seems odd. For example, the Chilean military regime's strategy for winning a referendum in 1989 on extending General Pinochet's rule arguably foundered on the counterstrategies of the democratic opposition, forcing the regime to accept a transition to democracy at an earlier date than it had originally planned. What is also likely to prove controversial is the degree to which Arceneaux believes that transition control is predetermined by the institutional arrangements of a military regime. Two of the central findings in the literature on democratization are that authoritarian regimes often lose control of liberalization processes and that transitions to democracy are often characterized by a high degree of uncertainty due to the fluid strategic interaction among the participants. It is not clear that the determinacy of Arceneaux's arguments and the institutionally centered explanations are compatible with these findings or provide sufficient evidence to disprove them.

Civil Society Before Democracy: Lessons from Nineteenth-Century Europe. Edited by Nancy Bermeo and Philip Nord. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 2000. 320p. $79.00 cloth, $26.95 paper.

Michael Bernhard, Pennsylvania State University

The Polish philosopher and diplomat Piotr Ogrodzinski has described "civil society" as a weasel word. It is hard to disagree, given that neo-Tocquevillians, Weberians, critical theorists, Christian fundamentalists, and World Bank analysts all unabashedly sing its praises while having completely different referents in mind for the term. Because it concerns itself with the historical development of civil society, rather than with some abstract idealized notion of it, this collection of essays by historians and social scientists is a sorely needed addition to the literature.

The editors have brought together a distinguished group of historians and social scientists to consider the issue of the development and emergence of civil society in nineteenth-century Europe. The conception of the nineteenth century is that of the long century running from the end of the Napoleonic Wars in 1815 to the end of World War I in 1918. The focus here is on the evolution of autonomous social actors in Western Europe beginning with the emergence of nineteenth-century liberalism.

The main question considered in the essays is how the emergence of civil society affected the transformation of liberalism into modern mass democracy. The first two sections of the book, overwhelmingly devoted to Western Europe, divide the cases considered according to whether the transition to mass democracy was successful or initially failed. The cases of failure considered are Portugal, Russia, Italy, and Germany. The second section is devoted to the success stories, Great Britain, France, Belgium, and The Netherlands. The third section, somewhat awkwardly titled "The Meaning of the Nineteenth Century Today," is a bit less coherent, composed of a learned historical essay by Valerie Bunce on the historical origins of the weakness of civil society in Eastern Europe (citing factors that go as far back as Roman times), an essay by Jan Kubik on the classic case of the reemergence of civil society under communism (Poland), and a nice syntheti conclusion by Nancy Bermeo.

Several broad lessons emerge from the essays. First, civil society is not inexorably linked to democracy, but historically has emerged in concert with several other forms of regime including monarchy, oligarchic liberalism, and mild or enfeebled types of authoritarianism. In certain European cases civil society emerged or held its own during the age of reaction in the first part of the nineteenth century, thrived in concert with liberal hegemony, and reemerged and challenged communism in its posttotalitarian phase. Second, civil society is not always good for democracy. Sometimes, in fact, its bestorganized elements may be ambivalent or even antithetic to democracy. Elements within civil society often major players in its breakdown. On this point the essays by Adrian Lyttelton on Italy and Klaus Tenfelde on Germany are quite good and build on the existing work in this vein by Sheri Berman and by Simone Chambers and Jeffrey Kopstein.

Third, the essays on the cases of failure all point out the difficulties in incorporating rural and traditional social formations into civil society. This observation both confirms and expands on the well-established insight that social formations with labor repressive and noncommercialized agriculture pose particular problems for democracy. Fourth, the essays that discuss cases of democratic success show very diverse patterns. Clearly, there is no single pattern by which civil society successfully connects with a democratic regime and/or promotes it. Britain represents one of the classic cases of how an associational culture developed and expanded in a slow and sure fashion. Whereas Robert Morris' essay in this volume does a very nice job of describing this, he does not whitewash the considerable failures of Britain in this regard, particularly with regard to Ireland. Raymond Huard's essay on France describes how civil society there eventually thrived despite the periodic attempts of the upper and middle classes to impede the ability of other social actors to organize and the relatively late institutionalization of freedom of association. And Thomas Ertman's essay on how democracy in Belgium and The Netherlands succeeded through the process of the "pillarization" of civil society points out how potentially strong social division and impediments to democracy and a robust civil society can be overcome. Kubik's essay on postcommunist Poland (based on his book with Grzegorz Ekiert) demonstrates that protest can function as a way to link the state and civil society in situations where the party system is weakly institutionalized and in flux.

Fifth, the connection between state and civil society emerges as a key variable in whether civil society plays a constructive role in building democracy. This is a point strongly made by Bermeo in her conclusion to the volume. This insight indicates that the role that political society plays in mediating between the state and civil society is a key area that demands more attention.

If I have one complaint about the book, it is that some of the essays by the historians are undertheorized. When I was reading them I was struck by how they could have been improved by a greater awareness of comparative historical social science on the origins of democracy and modernity or even the work of well-known historians who have participated in these debates such as Geoff Ely and Charles Maier. This is a strategy that, to my mind, succeeds admirably in the introductory essay by Philip Nord.

This is the sort of edited collection that merits wide reading because it treats an important concept that has suffered lately (from both overuse and conceptual stretching) in a nuanced, historically complex, and theoretically sophisticated matter. It reminds us about what is strongly problematic about doctoral dissertations using only canned data on NGOs and polity scores to generalize about the relationship between civil society and democratic consolidation. Finally, the case studies on their own are quite useful as a resource reference for those doing comparative historical research on modern Europe.

Power and City Governance: Comparative Perspectives on Urban Development. By Alan DiGaetano and John S. Klemanski. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1999. 328p. $57.95 cloth, $22.95 paper

Michael Jones-Correa, Cornell University

The field of urban politics has been in the theoretical doldrums for some 20 years now. This is not to say there has been a dearth of scholarship; on the contrary, empirical case studies taking political economy, policy, or institutional approaches have been common. But unlike the heyday of the study of the field through the 1970s, there has been no compelling debate that has held the attention of students of American politics and political scientists more generally. Alan DiGaetano and John Klemanski set themselves up for no small task, then, by seeking not simply to establish comparisons between cities in the United States and Great Britain, but to build a new theoretical foundation for the study of city politics and for urban political economy more generally. On the whole, while the authors provide a sweeping vista of the state of the field, the theoretical edifice they build is not solid enough to sustain the weight of their own hypotheses and claims.

The arguments in Power and City Governance are constructed around paired case studies in the United States and the United Kingdom. The authors pair Boston and Bristol, two seaport cities now turned toward advanced service economy, with Detroit and Birmingham, two industrial centers still struggling with their economic and civic redevelopment. The paired cases are designed not only to illustrate how differences in state structuring entail very different possibilities and constraints for cities in the two countries, but also to illuminate differences in the approaches cities have taken within each country.

The broader picture presented by the authors is that metropolitan areas in both countries have gone through fundamental economic restructuring over the last generation, leading to the deindustrialization of cities. In the United States, cities have dealt with this transition largely on their own, relying heavily on local resources to restructure their economies. In Britain, on the other hand, cities have been relatively insulated from the swing of the economic pendulum by substantial grants from the state. The flip side to this financial cushion is that cities in Britain have less autonomy in policy arenas, while the relative fiscal self-sufficiency of American cities also gives them greater autonomy in the political sphere.

Power and City Governance focuses on the period of the 1980s and 1990s, when urban policy in Great Britain and the United States seemed to be converging. The British government at this time encouraged an increasingly entrepreneurial approach in local governance, turning, for instance, to competitive grants to encourage policy innovation at the local level. This meant that there was room for British cities, like their American counterparts, to take a greater variety of approaches in their response to economic restructuring. (Note, however, that for differences within countries to become salient, differences across countries become less so. It is less than clear, at the book's conclusion, what difference national distinctions make.)

Through the 1980s and 1990s the redevelopment policies cities pursued in these two countries were very much shaped by the coalitions that governed them. These coalitions were led largely by city officials, business elites, and community activists and in different configurations pursued different kinds of agendas. DiGaetano and Klemanski posit at least four: growth coalitions, social reform coalitions, growth management coalitions, and caretaker coalitions. In addition, each of these coalitions has different characteristics. For one, they have different power structures, so they can be composed of rival factions, contingent coalitions, enduring coalitions, or prevailing coalitions, as well as by regimes. The power structures determine the power arrangements of coalitions, which can be dominant, bargaining, or preemptive. DiGaetano and Klemanski discuss nine cases in their book, a case being where a city changed governing coalitions. However, each of these coalitions also had at least one of three power arrangements and one of five configurations of power (besides, of course, being in one of two countries). In their attempt to capture the nuance of urban power arrangements, the authors quickly plunge the reader into a bewildering array of coalitional possibilities and outcomes, resulting in a situation where the possible combinations of variables far exceeds the number of cases that can explain the outcomes.

To be fair, the purpose of the authors' careful and nuanced account is to avoid falling into what they feel has been the pitfall of much of the recent literature in urban politics, which is an overreliance on political economy as the principal explanatory variable for political outcomes. Political and economic variables need not be correlated, in their view. What DiGaetano and Klemanski wish to show is that the agendas pursued by coalitions are not necessarily linked to the economic fortune of their cities. However, a closer look at their cases shows otherwise. Birmingham and Detroit, the two cities most constrained economically during the period of the study, only ever had progrowth coalitions. Boston and Bristol, with middle-class constituencies in diversified highend service economies, pursued a greater variety of developmental agendas. But these varied outcomes actually followed a pattern: In times of recession both cities pursued progrowth policies, while in times of economic expansion, both cities had room to experiment with slow-growth or reform agendas. Judging from the cases presented here, it seems that economics may explain rather a lot of the variance in political outcomes after all.

Alternative explanations that might have helped bolster their argument, in particular, greater attention to institutions and institutional variance and their impact on policy outcomes, receive rather short shrift in this study. Given the parameters of the book, then, the simpler and more elegant explanation for urban agendas is that cities are constrained by the imperative of economic growth, but once this growth is achieved, cities with greater resources have more room to pursue other alternatives, a situation nicely illustrated by David DeLeon's (1992) case study of San Francisco, Left Coast City: Progressive Politics in San Francisco; 1975–1991 as well as by DiGaetano and Klemanski's descriptions of Boston and Bristol. However, the stories of Boston and Bristol versus Detroit and Birmingham in Power and City Governance are obscured, in the end, by the book's unwieldy theoretical construct.

Radical Women in Latin America: Left and Right. Edited by Victoria Gonzalez and Karen Kampwirth. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2001. 352p. $55.00 cloth, $18.95 paper.

Georgina Waylen, University of Sheffield

In recent years more attention has begun to be paid to the different forms of women's engagement with the conventional political arena in Latin America. This interest partly reflects the impact of transitions to democracy and the demobilization of social movements. But it also reflects a change of approach by many of the scholars examining women's political activities as they have reassessed the importance of institutions and the salience of "politics."

This volume reflects these trends. Some of the contributions look at women who are organizing as women, but around political goals (using a narrow definition of what counts as political), not gender issues. Margaret Power, for example, examines right-wing women organizing for a "yes" vote in support of Pinochet in the Chilean plebiscite of 1988. Lisa Baldez looks at two groups of political women (often prominent members of political parties) organizing as what she calls "political outsiders" in groups that operated outside the conventional political arena in Chile. One group, Poder Feminino, mobilized in support of military intervention to remove the Allende government in the early 1970s. The other, Mujeres por la Vida, mobilized to get the Pinochet regime out of power in the 1980s.

A number of the articles in the collection also look at women who are active within a range of political parties, although there is probably more discussion of those on the left, such as the ex-revolutionary parties in Central America and a new party like the PT, the Brazilian workers party, than those on the right. Indeed this is perhaps the book's greatest novelty. It analyses women identified with both the left and the right of the political spectrum, sometimes even in the same chapter. Karen Kampwirth, for example, examines women fighting for both the Contras and the Sandinistas in Nicaragua. This juxtapositioning has been done only very rarely in the past. This is partly, as hinted at in the collection itself, because until now most of the analysis of women's organizing has focused on women's "progressive" organizing rather than organizing in favor of the status quo or right-wing political projects.

The focus on radical women of both the left and the right allows some important themes to come to fore. Many of the articles engage with the possibilities for and limits to coalition building—How far is it possible for women of different political persuasions to unite around certain issues? This notion of conjunctural coalition building is one that is currently also being explored by other scholars. Many of the articles demonstrate the limits of that coalition building. The coalitions that Baldez examines are possible only over relatively limited segments of the political spectrum. Only women from the right and center-right united to oppose Allende and only women from different parts of the left and center came together to oppose the Pinochet regime. It is often thought that more unity is possible around "gender issues." However, a number of the articles in this volume reinforce the argument that gender rights are not one issue but many and different actors can take up a variety of different positions depending on the issue. Patricia Hipsher, in her analysis of postrevolutionary El Salvador, demonstrates that although there are some campaigns, such as those for child support, against domestic violence, and even for quotas, over which a range of women could unite, there are others, such as abortion and women's economic rights in Free Trade Zones, that remain too divisive.

The second theme that runs through many of the articles is the relationship of feminism to political parties, again not only on the left but also on the right of the political spectrum. Treading some quite well worn ground, Hipsher shows how the El Salvadorean feminist movement emerged out of the left and Liesl Haas argues that, despite problems, many Brazilian feminists have found the PT a more hospitable environment than the other political parties. How far the political left can be a constraint or an enabler for feminism therefore remains contentious question. More unusually, Victoria Gonzalez looks at the ways in which the Somocistas absorbed the Nicaraguan feminist movement that had emerged in the first half of the twentieth century and thereby also challenges the commonly held belief that Nicaraguan women did not organize until much more recently. In an extension of this theme of the relationship between feminism and politics, more discussion of whether there is any continued relevance to the old feminista/politica split might have also been useful.

In their introduction, the editors identify autonomy—defined as independence from political parties and guerilla organizations—as another theme that they believe is central to many of the contributions. The use of the term autonomy is perhaps to state the argument too simplistically. The more complex issue of what should be the nature of the relationship with political parties and, more broadly, with the state and policymaking bodies has preoccupied many women activists and scholars. In her discussion of the decision not to have a women's section in the PT, Haas highlights some of the debates that have surrounded the question of how women should organize within political parties. The contributions in this volume therefore serve to reinforce the argument that the question of women activists' goals and how they are shaped by the institutional context in which they are operating is an important one that deserves further investigation.

Maternalism is the final theme that the editors identify. Again, this is an issue that has already quite rightly received a great deal of attention. The contribution of this volume is to challenge some of the more simplistic analyses by showing some of the ways in which motherhood has been used by the left at the same time as demonstrating that right-wing women do not always mobilize as mothers as is sometimes assumed. Power, for example, shows how some right-wing Chilean women wanted to be active in the public sphere as citizens rather than as mothers.

Although the focus on radical women of the left and right allows a number of key questions to be addressed in novel ways, it is perhaps too dichotomous, thereby obscuring some other important themes. Populism, for example, does not fit easily within this framework. As well as making the volume more balanced in terms of the number of contributions in each of the South and Central American sections, a discussion of postwar Argentina could have considered the relationship of women activists to Peronism in the 1950s and its contemporary legacy. This would also have provided some continuity with the article by Sandra McGee Deutsch that examines Brazil, Chile, and Argentina between 1900 and 1940. Unlike the first two countries, it is not followed up later in the volume with a more up-to-date discussion of Argentina.

These comments not withstanding, this collection is grounded in extensive research and contains a number of timely and thought-provoking articles that will make a useful contribution to the increasingly sophisticated literature on women and politics in Latin America.

Constructing Sustainable Development. By Neil E. Harrison. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2000. 175p. $55.50 cloth, $18.95 paper.

Rodger A. Payne, University of Louisville

Nearly 15 years has elapsed since the World Commission on Environment and Development—the so-called Brundtland Commission—popularized the idea of "sustainable development." The phrase turned out to be unusually slippery, providing both political cover and ammunition for almost anyone engaged in debates about the global environment and/or development. Indeed, scholars and policymakers of all theoretical or ideological stripes found creative ways to employ the phrase "sustainable development" to support a wide array of arguments in these discussions.

Neil Harrison has written a clear and concise book that addresses important questions related to the ambiguous and multiple meanings. He analyzes, in the postmodern tradition, three dominant, yet often conflicting, policy narratives of sustainable development. These are efficiency, equity, and ethics. For each narrative, Harrison explains and evaluates the premises and arguments borrowed from various social, economic, or political theories. Then, over the course of five short chapters, he highlights logical inconsistencies that make viable policy goals literally impossible to achieve. The author reveals the conceit often hidden in these narratives and, in turn, promotes greater humility. His arguments are sharp, but his purpose is not mere deconstruction. In fact, Harrison often notes the elements of a narrative that might be made to work and that should be preserved in some fashion.

Still, Harrison concludes quite forcefully that "sustainable development is a Holy Grail that does not exist. It is a legend, a myth.... [The term] cannot be objectively defined, cannot be known" (p. 99). So what would people have to do to make development sustainable, which is the goal the author establishes on the book's first page (p. vii)? The answer is certainly not found in traditional literatures on economics, politics, or environmental ethics. The chapters on efficiency, for example, describe and critique biases in the neoclassical vision of the market and then dissect alleged technological fixes, which are not likely to be developed in the current political-economic context. The chapters on equity likewise explain why neither redistribution of wealth nor international cooperation is about to occur. Finally, Harrison demonstrates that no society can embrace ecologically ethical policies without first embracing environmental ideals. This presents a bootstrapping dilemma, since ideas cannot be changed absent education policies that promote ecology.

Harrison offers his own recommendations in the final chapter. He borrows from the postmodern tradition to find metanarratives that might be able to transcend barriers across the political, economic, and social divides he has identified (p. 101). From this perspective, the author derives a need for a far more participatory politics and an ecological view of science that values flexibility and adaptability. Data need to be accumulated, and education promoted, he asserts, so as to match the most appropriate policy initiatives to local needs. Perhaps most controversially, Harrison wants sustainable development to be "the central concern of political discourse" (p. 118).

If most of these prescriptions seem somewhat vague and (at least to the informed reader) mundane, Harrison is unapologetic. On the last page, he returns to an earlier admonition (chapter 2) that policies supporting sustainable development (or virtually any policy goal) "are always stabs in the dark, best guesses in an uncertain world" (p. 118). Harrison's broad challenge to "rational" economics, science, and policymaking, however, might tempt readers to question whether his preferred choices are better than those he critiques. After all, the author warns that sustainable development seems to be "the ultimate 'postmodern' issue" and "can be interpreted to support any agenda, or objective" (p. 102).

Consider Harrison's plea for education. While the author means his claims to be taken differently, it is difficult to imagine that college administrators will be persuaded to build their general education or liberal arts curriculums around the idea of sustainable development precisely "because it can mean everything to everybody" (p. 118). Harrison stresses that education should be sensitive to ambiguity and that teachers should take diverse perspectives into account when considering something as elusive as sustainable development. In practice, however, his warnings literally seem to imply that nothing is valid and that everything is valid.

Why should an idea like the precautionary principle (pp. 16, 111), for example, presumptively favor environmental goals? A probusiness advocate might argue that caution demands favoring jobs and economic well-being over "risky" policies to defend the environment. During the Cold War, "worst-case planning" meant spending hundreds of billions of dollars on nuclear weapons to promote "security." No one should assume that environmental goals would come out on top if the most basic societal goals started to be compared. Harrison's argument for community and participatory politics could even subvert environmental objectives. In actual debates about forest policies, loggers of the U.S. Pacific Northwest apparently prefer retaining their jobs to preserving owl habitats.

Anyone who has perused the right's antienvironmental literature (e.g., see Ronald Bailey, Eco-Scam, 1993), quickly learns how postmodern insights and arguments can be turned against environmentalists. Scientists have often been wrong about past warnings of ecological or resource collapse, the skeptics assert, so why should anyone make costly policies based upon their latest warnings about global warming? The problem is magnified when a scientist or two challenges the environmental views.

Postmodernists, ironically, might fault Harrison for failing to embrace their project more fully. He acknowledges that his "approach is not specifically postmodern" (p. 112) and at times he seems to favor the employment of both material and instrumental measures. For instance, he advocates substantial increases in aid to poor countries, which would essentially bribe them to support sustainable development. He also supports higher taxes on consumption to influence consumer demand for resources. Yet material levers distort dialogue and would not necessarily promote an ecological mindset.

Harrison's book seems most useful for educators who teach undergraduate or master's-level courses about the environment. Students would benefit from the author's succinct and lucid critique of prevailing economic, political, and ethical theories and from his application of postmodern theorizing. No doubt, Harrison's arguments would provoke interesting and useful classroom exchanges.

Development and Crisis of the Welfare State: Parties and Policies in Global Markets. By Evelyne Huber and John D. Stephens. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2001. 368p. $54.00 cloth, $18.00 paper.

Alexander Hicks, Emory University

This is surely the most ambitious and the most accomplished study of affluent post-World War II democratic welfare states. It uses statistical, case study, and comparative historical methods to describe and explain the course of social welfare policy over the second half of the twentieth century in 16 nations. Quantitatively, the study examines social insurance and service programs, major public expenditure and revenue aggregates, and an array of fine-grained indicators of state redistributive and safety net outcomes, from 1960 through 1994. Somewhat more qualitatively, the study extends its reach to encompass job and gender, labor market, and educational policies over the whole 1945-1996 period. Using both quantitative and qualitative methods of explanatory analysis, the work assesses various accounts of welfare state development and crisis, in particular, its authors' institutionally amplified, class-analytical political resource theory.

The effort provides us ample explanatory and theoretical news and sets the benchmark for future work on its subject. The book's central thesis, in broad strokes, is that partisan choice—grounded in partisan political economic mobilization and state governance and exercised under the constraint of constitutional structures and policy precedents (or "legacies")—determines welfare policy. In more detail, the thesis is that over the long run—during the three-decade "Golden Age" following World War II most particularly—accumulated Left and Christian rule, aided by labor union mobilization and coordinated (as opposed to pure market) economic organization, drove a largely irreversible development of post-War welfare policy. The development is cumulative in the sense that causal forces largely are limited to ratcheting up or containing welfare state advance. Importantly, Left/Christian prominence in directing the expansion of welfare states is unequivocally claimed only into early in a post-1973 "crisis" that transforms relentless development into adaptive slowdown, or reactionary devolution. Cumulative Christian—not social—democratic government is seen as relatively important for social insurance and transfer-payment programs, while Left government is seen as relatively important for social services, overall state scale, and income redistribution and poverty reduction. Left/Christian forces expanding welfare states are complemented by constitutional structures insofar as these engender consensual policy and few veto points. They are also complemented by female labor force participation, especially to the extent that this is politically aided by Left governance. Although the book's Left/Christian thesis is hardly original (dating back to 1970s works by David Cameron, Walter Korpi, and Stephens), its program and period specifications of the thesis, as well as its institutional and female-labor force amplifications of it, cap Huber and Stephens' innovative 1990s work.

Complementing the book's core developmental thesis is its account of crisis. Here Huber and Stephens argue that it is not economic globalization that has driven welfare-state "retrenchment." In particular, economic stagnation, rooted less in globalization than rising real interest rates (plus such conjunctural factors as the 1990-ish strains of German unification and collapse of Soviet imports), has—at least where neoliberal modes of economic thinking have been relatively circumscribed as in northern and Continental Europe. There stagnation, via a crisis of high and recalcitrant unemployment, has occasioned small downward adjustments of the welfare state. Where neoliberal views have been more hegemonic, neoliberalism itself, especially when facilitated by Conservative party government and majoritarian and unitary polities as in the 1980s United Kingdom and 1990s New Zealand, has driven deep and reactionary retrenchments. The book's account of these matters, while not systematic enough to provide a final word, should influence much opinion and further investigation.

As regards the particular hypothesis that female entry into the labor force buoys welfare policy, especially where left parties tend to rule, Huber and Stephens' important statistical case for this very plausible thesis is qualified by two statistical glitches. Estimates of female effects on policy might, due to simultaneity bias, be artifacts of policy effects on female labor force participation; and the cumulative measure of left rule is questionable. As regards state structure, the book's claim for "constitutional" constraints on the welfare state is very convincing.

The claim for Left and Christian Democratic rule as the prime determinants of post-War welfare-state policy is strongly suppoted by the convergence of findings across a range of outcome measures. In the crucial Tables 3.2–3.5 of 1960–1985 long-run analyses, this range encompasses both social security benefits and (more narrowly) transfer payments, government revenues as well as expenditures, and civilian public consumption spending—all as shares of GDP—in additions to measures of public civilian employment, the public share of health spending, and the per-retiree public share of GDP. Across these eight regressands, support for "Left cabinet" effects emerges at least six times, seven if social security benefits (analyzed under six notably varying explanatory specifications and apparently prowelfarist in all but a case or two) is judged supportive, and nearly as much support for Christian Democratic effects is marshaled. (Further evidence is provided by a dozen more fine-grained safety net measures.) Case studies of nine relatively advanced welfare states, each specified to both "Golden Age" and "crisis" periods, is richly informative. Though lack of case detail on less generous welfare states limits systematic comparison (posing nagging puzzles about the likes of feckless British Labour and progressive French Conservatives), processes of welfare expansion and contraction are very valuably detailed for all of the most generous welfare states.

Despite all these strengths, some readers' assent to Huber and Stephens' claims for the explanatory preeminence of Left and Christian partisan government for welfare-state policy (especially prior to 1970s troubles) will be clouded by the authors' hardly compelling attempts to distinguish partisan rule from a few potentially competing, collinear explanatory factors. These include labor union strength and interest organization (e.g., neocorporatism), as well as political-ideological legacies (e.g., midcentury consolidation of welfare precedence and opinion) and broad secular trends in industrialization, aging, statism, and the like. They connote more technical issues of model specification (e.g., partisanship versus ideological climate interest-organization), measurement choice (cumulative versus noncumulative cabinet indexation), and estimation (e.g., static or dynamic) that can be neither ignored nor settled here. In summary, the book's core cases for the explanatory predominance of Left/Christian partisan governance—not merely of a broader amalgam of classlinked and labor- and left-centered forces—commands the most serious attention if not unanimous and full agreement.

In the social sciences major works are seldom definitive. This book will become an important political economic text and a mainstay of welfare-state and comparative political and policy studies for specialized students of the welfare state and comparative political economy. Development and Crisis of the Welfare State may lack the closure and elegance to settle its issues for social scientists or to reconcile humanists to its analytical density. It has the power to influence strongly belief and controversy in the fields of welfare-state, political economic, political sociological, and comparative historical investigation for years to come.

East Central Europe in the Modern World: The Politics of the Borderlands from Pre- to Postcommunism. By Andrew C. Janos. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 2000. 488p. $65.00.

Ilya Prizel, University of Pittsburgh

This is a learned and intriguing book covering the span of modern history of East Central Europe as well as the Balkans. The scope of the book is broad, including various theoretical approaches, historical analysis, and a rich discussion of economics. There is a particularly interesting description of technological innovations' impact on the region's economic and political structure. Unlike some earlier books on the region, which tended to treat Eastern Europe as a region outside the international context, Andrew Janos's work does an excellent job of both relating the impact of events in the "center" of the international system on the region and providing an outstanding comparison to Latin America, the other quasi-"peripheral" region of the international system during the last 300 years.

Given the scope of the book and its intellectual depth, it stands to reason that it is bound to raise questions, some of which go unanswered and thus warrant further discussion. Although Janos provides the reader with a detailed discussion of the decline of liberalism in Central and Eastern Europe and the rise of nationalism, several issues could benefit from greater elaboration and elucidation. First, the term "Liberalism" is never fully defined. While reading the book the reader is often confused about whether the author's use of the term "liberalism" is the classic usage, which grew out of the Scottish and later enlightenment and culminated in the rise of the "Manchester School," with its emphasis on tolerance and economic laissez-faire, or the French version, which is associated with rationalism and etatism but does not call for either cultural tolerance or a minimalist state (Gertrude Himmelfarb, "The Idea of Compassion: The British vs. French Enlightenment," The Public Interest 145 (Fall 2001)).

The discussion focusing on the collapse of liberalism would have very much benefited from an analysis of the impact of the economic crash of 1873 and the ensuing economic depression, which, among other things, saw the birth of "racial" rather than "religious" anti-Semitism. Similarly, when dealing with the political radicalization in late nineteenth-century East Central Europe, there is, in this reviewer's view, insufficient emphasis on the impact of intellectual trends emanating from Germany or the intellectual roots of modern political clericism; neither Johann v. Herder, Wilhelm Marr, German Romanticism, nor Rerum Novarum are even mentioned in the book.

When dealing with the interwar period, Janos gives us an outstanding and insightful account of the political strategies of Ion Antonescu in Romania, Miklos Horty in Hungary, and Rev. Jozef Tiso in Slovakia. However, the lack of explanation of the intellectual origins of the political forces that shaped Central Europe in much of the twentieth century makes the otherwise lucid and interesting analysis of nationalism, clericism, and fascism somewhat incoherent.

In discussing events surrounding World War II, Janos gives one of the most coherent and substantive descriptions of the complex relationship of the conservative corporatist regimes of Romania, Hungary, Bulgaria, Slovakia, and Croatia with Nazi Germany. A clear and detailed picture is presented of how the various axis regimes attempted to pursue their national interests within the "New European Order" without being fully dragged into the Nazi agenda, particularly after the German reversal at the battle of Stalingrad. In his discussion of the relationships between Germany and its allies, Janos gives a vivd account of the economic exploitation of the various axis powers by Nazi Germany, with Romania alone being able to avoid economic exploitation by the Reich. While Janos's point that the agenda of Hitler's Central European allies was far from identical to that of Berlin, the discussion of the collaboration of the regimes in the implementation of the "Final Solution" is puzzling at times. The Tiso regime is presented as one that is fighting rear-guard action to slow and possibly prevent the deportation of the Jews from Slovakia; however, there is no attempt to reconcile the fact that Slovakia was willing to pay to the Reich RM500 per person in "removal fees" for Slovakia's Jews. Furthermore, most historians do accept Raul Hilberg's typology, which claims that before the Final Solution could be implemented, a prolonged isolation and the dehumanization of the Jews had to take place. Given the various strategies, such as the "Numerous Clauses" pursued by Miklos Horty in Hungary and the economic war against the Jews declared by Poland's ruling "Sanacja," a strong case can be made that much of the preparatory work for the Final Solution was carried out by the Central European regimes long before they fell into the orbit of Nazi Germany. Another puzzling statement in the book concerning World War II is the notion that Stalin did not grasp the importance of nuclear weapons (p. 330). While it is true that, when told by President Truman at the Potsdam Conference that the United States had managed to detonate a nuclear bomb, Stalin appeared to be oblivious, given the fact that the USSR had its "Manhattan Project," presided over by Laverntii Beria, as early as 1942 and given the intense Soviet spying on the Manhattan Project, there is empirical evidence that Stalin grasped the importance of the nuclear age early.

The last third of the book is devoted to the dynamics of communization and the collapse of communism in the late 1980s. Janos gives one of the most lucid analyses and descriptions of the progressive decay of the Soviet imperial system and the rise of the corrupt rent-seeking elite in Brezhnev's USSR and other countries of the socialist bloc. The last chapters present an excellent discussion of the dynamics of communist disintegration and a wealth of economic as well as sociological data, giving the reader a clear three-dimensional picture of the late communism and early postcommunist period.

The book concludes with a poignant and elegiac discussion of the emerging relationship between the East Central European "periphery" and the new "Center" in the guise of the patronizing European Union. This thoughtful conclusion is powerfully argued and should be read by all those who are interested in the "New Europe" and the particularly painful transition inflicted on the people of the periphery—once again, in the name of a "brilliant future."

Despite the reservations noted above, which any book of this length and intellectual depth is bound to provoke, I believe that this book is an important scholarly achievement that will be of scholarly interest for a long time to come.

Election Studies: What's Their Use. Edited by Elihu Katz and Yael Warshel. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2001. 285p. $36.00 paper.

Mark N. Franklin, Trinity College Connecticut

In 1999, Kathleen Hall Jamieson of the Annenberg School for Communications, University of Pennsylvania, was awarded a large grant to fund a survey-based study of the 2000 presidential election. In anticipation of that study, and to help in its design, a colloquium was held in the Fall of 1999, titled "What's a Good Election Study, and What Are Election Studies Good for?" The chapters contained in Election Studies: What's Their Use? are the product of that colloquium.

The title of the volume is provocative, but the contents are much less so. Though many of the chapters contain suggestions for ways in which election studies could be improved, all of them are addressed first and foremost to describing (and sometimes defending) existing procedures and past findings. Readers looking for a thoroughgoing critique of election studies in general and American election studies in particular will have to look elsewhere.

But the fact that Election Studies: What's Their Use? does not live up to its title is not to say that it is a bad book. Rather, the reverse: This is a useful compendium of information about election studies that, though eclectic and somewhat haphazard, would be hard to come by in any other single publication. It is well written and engaging, and even someone who is steeped in the literature of election studies will find much that is interesting and useful in every chapter.

After an editors' introduction that explains how the book came to be written, there are two chapters (by William McGuire and Larry Bartels) that focus on voting research in the United States. Though the first purports to be an assessment of past achievements and the second an agenda for future research, both are concerned mainly with summarizing (from different and complementary viewpoints) the major achievements of the American National Election Studies (ANES) since they were founded in 1948, and both contain a number of suggestions for directions in which future research might move. My problem with both chapters (as with most of the chapters in this book) is that they are highly personal and idiosyncratic to the interests of each author. These are well-regarded scholars, and their viewpoints are certainly worthy of study, but there is no pretense of covering all aspects of ANES's achievements, and at the end of these two chapters one wonders what has been left out.

There follow four chapters (by Juan Linz, Seymour Martin Lipset, Asher Arian and Michal Shamir, and Richard Johnson) that might have been placed together as being "election studies from around the world," since they focus on Spain, Israel, Canada, and (Lipset's excellent contribution) the early history of voting research in the United States. In these chapters we learn about some of the concerns that have guided election studies other than the ANES, though the choice of which election studies to include in this section is not just idiosyncratic but arcane. The topics covered, with the exception of the Canadian chapter, which describes cuttingedge methods for studying election campaigns, do not include any that currently take center stage in major journals, and though several of the approaches discussed in these chapters could fruitfully be incorporated into American election studies, there is no reason given for focusing on these particular approaches at the expense of others. In particular, the failure to include any mention of Dutch election studies, which have been at the forefront of multiple innovations over the past 30 years, is incomprehensible.

The book closes with three chapters on rather more specific topics. Actually, the Canadian chapter might as well be included in this set, making four such chapters: campaign research (by Richard Johnson), issue voting (by Merril Shanks), communications research (by Jay Blumler and Denis McQuail), and news management (by John Zaller). Of these, the last is a characteristically outstanding piece of original research that should probably have appeared in a professional journal; the others are largely surveys of what has been done, in the same vein as the book's earlier chapters.

These final four chapters are directed, more than any of the others, at making suggestions for innovations that might be incorporated in future election studies (particularly in future ANESs). However, again the reader is left with the questions, Why these topics? and What other topics might have been addressed?—questions which provide the leitmotif of my concerns about this volume.

Let me briefly address those two questions by summarizing three linked concerns: (1) the endogeneity problem that arises when dependent and independent variables are derived from interviews with the same people; (2) sampling problems in most election studies that make it hard for us to measure effects of the magnitude that often determine election outcomes in real life; and (3) the difficulty of fitting into any one survey all the questions that would need to be asked if all the research topics of interest to the academic community were to be addressed. These three concerns are linked in that a single solution can be imagined that addresses all three of them, but not one of these three concerns is specifically addressed in any of the chapters in the volume under review. (For those interested in research that does address these questions, see the special issue of Electoral Studies [21:1, 2002] edited by Mark Franklin and Christopher Wlezien.)

Overall, this is a volume that is well worth reading for the surveys it provides (which hardly overlap) and the ideas it contains. One ends the book with a fine appreciation for what survey research (particularly American survey research) has achieved in 50 years of studying electoral behavior. The fact that one does not learn much about the emerging crisis in electoral research would have been a fairly minor omission had the book's title not led one to expect some attention to that topic.

The Red-Green Coalition in Germany: Politics, Personalities and Power. By Charles Lees. Manchester, England: Manchester University Press, 2001. 157p. $69.95 cloth, $19.95 paper.

M. Donald Hancock, Vanderbilt University

Charles Lees has produced a succinct yet compelling assessment of the Greens' "long march to power" in Germany through a succession of state governments to the Social Democratic–Green national coalition formed following the 1998 Bundestag election. His account is conceptually sound and (apart from several omissions) highly informative. It provides useful insights into the dynamics of SPD–Green politics that will interest German specialists and comparativists alike.

Lees's book is divided into nine chapters, including an introduction and a brief conclusion. He bases his narrative explication of the decisions by the SPD and Greens to share power on the state and national levels of government in Germany—as well as their record in office—on a coalition theory model of party politics. To this end, Lees begins with a nuanced review of coalition theory as initially formulated by Anthony Downs, William Riker, and William Gamson. Echoing criticism by Eric Browne and others that these early formulations lacked sufficient predictive power, Lees builds on arguments by Robert Axelrod, Abram de Swaan, and Kenneth Shepsele to construct his own model of coalition formation and maintenance. His empirical focus is on SPD-Green coalitions, but conceptually his formulation has heuristic value with respect to governing coalitions in general. Lees's "ideal type" of a Red-Green model embraces a selective emphasis on ideological affinities and policy-related priorities among parties, a leadership preference for minimal connected winning coalitions as a means to facilitate cabinet stability, and multiple institutional dimensions that include the distribution of ministerial portfolios and varying degrees of expertise among administrative officials serving each of the coalition partners.

Lees proceeds to a brief account of the origins of the SPD and the Greens, noting the persistence of ideological divisions within both parties and recounting the Greens's transition during the 1980s and 1990s from a grass-roots "antiparty party" into a mainstream party affirming basic tenets of postwar Germany's prevailing democratic and social market consensus. He then briefly describes the succession of SPD-Green coalitions formed since 1982, beginning with a short-lived cabinet in Hamburg and continuing through subsequent coalitions in Hesse, Lower Saxony, West Berlin, and ultimately the Federal Republic.

Lees utilizes the experience of the SPD-Green coalitions in West Berlin (1989) and Lower Saxony (1990-94) as chapterlength case studies to test his model of coalition formation and performance. Characterized from their appearance on the German political scene by a deep cleavage between fundamentalist (fundo) and pragmatic (realo) ideological factions within the party, the Greens managed to join the SPD in both state governments only because adherents of the latter faction managed to find common ground with the Social Democrats on a selective range of policy orientations. Among them were a shared concern with environmental and gender issues. Persisting tension between the fundo and the realo wings, however, complicated governance for both the Greens and the Social Democrats. Contributing to the Greens's frustration in office was their limited allocation of cabinet seats in comparison with the larger SPD and their difficulty in staffing "their" ministries with party loyalists sufficiently versed in administrative politics. Both coalitions thus unraveled—quickly in West Berlin because of a rapid escalation of policy conflicts, at the end of a four-year interval in Lower Saxony when the SPD won a majority in the 1994 state election and could therefore dispense with Green support.

The larger, more populous state of Hesse constituted a more successful model of SPD-Green collaboration (and deserves a chapter in its own right) in the long runup to the 1998 Bundestag election. There, the two parties governed jointly from 1985 to 1987 and again after 1991; the coalition was reelected in 1995 (a first for the Greens). A key explanation for the party's success lies in the political competence of Joshka Fischer, their regional leader and Germany's first Green minister of the environment. Firmly identified with the pragmatic faction of the party, Fischer's moderation and solid achievements in office helped legitimize the Greens' claim to national power and pave the way to the formation of an all-German coalition government in 1998.

Lees's account of Fischer's rise to national preeminence prior to his appointment as foreign minister underscores a key subtext of his book, namely, the importance of personality in politics (which cannot be easily factored into a formal model of coalition formation). He provides an even more probing analysis of Gerhard Schröder, who began his own political ascent as leader of the SPD in Lower Saxony. Lees astutely dissects Schröder's attributes as a populist pragmatist with probusiness sympathies, his record (in both Lower Saxony and Berlin) as a tough negotiator, and his ideological embrace of a "new center" in German politics reminiscent of electoral politics pursued by Bill Clinton and Tony Blair. Lees is equally observant in his assessment of Schröder's principal rival within the SPD, Oskar LaFontaine, former ministerpresident of the Saarland who served as minister of finance in the SPD-Green coalition until his dramatic resignation in March 1999. Their conflict, Lees correctly contends, epitomizes the SPD's own internal cleavage between neoliberal and Keynesian factions. Lees is less charitable about the depth of Schröder's ideological convictions, contending that the chancellor's triumph over LaFontaine and his turnaround in public esteem after a desultory first year in office are products more of Fortuna than shrewd political behavior.

Lees's well-informed and thoughtful analysis would have been strengthened if he had broadened the scope of his inquiry to include an account of the East German Greens and a more detailed treatment of the effects of German unification on party politics. He makes only a passing reference to the former when he notes resistance on the part of many West German Greens to a merger of the two parties and restricts his discussion of unification primarily to its immediate impact on the short-lived SPD-Green coalition of 1989 in West Berlin.

The continuing fluidity of German politics as the nation struggles to define a new international role for itself while managing complex domestic economic and social issues poses serious risks for the Greens as they compete for electoral survival between the more moderate Social Democrats and the more radical Party of Democratic Socialism (PDS). A companion volume to Lees's study might well focus on the conditions and prospects of conceivable SPD-PDS coalitions on at least the regional level of German politics.

Mexico: The Struggle for Democratic Development. Daniel C. Levy and Kathleen Bruhn, with Emilio Zebadúa. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2001. 362p. $48.00 cloth, $18.95 paper.

Roderic Ai Camp, Claremont McKenna College

Daniel Levy and Kathleen Bruhn, leading Mexicanists, use their scholarly expertise to provide a welcome addition to the literature on contemporary Mexican politics. This work is a lucid, well-integrated interpretation of Mexico's recent transformation economically and politically. It benefits from the past research of both authors and from the insights of their Mexican colleague. The book's primary focus, as they argue in the introductory chapter, is the fundamental role of democracy in altering Mexico's developmental path and political discourse.

They argue that instead of Mexico shifting from an authoritarian to a democratic model in July, 2000, in the aftermath of Vicente Fox's election, it moved from a "semidemocracy," in the last two decades, to a democracy. The authors do not suggest that Mexico is a complete democracy, however, only that when using three common measures of democracy, these measures, including basic citizen rights, remain fragile and incomplete. One of the important underlying themes they explore is the relationship between a stable and an undemocratic political system. They correctly suggest that Mexican failures socially are numerous and that most Mexicans, despite certain macroeconomic benefits associated with North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), have failed to improve their personal economic situation. In fact, they conclude that Mexico gained more jobs than the United States as a result of the free trade agreement. Nevertheless, they emphasize the irony of this severe economic gap occurring simultaneously with political liberalization, noting that the poorest Mexicans have been decisively excluded from the decision making process.

The other major theme they introduce, and revert to throughout the work, is the United States' changing role in Mexico and its bilateral relationship with Mexico. In their specific chapter on "Mexico in a U.S.-Led World," they analyze three important issues on the bilateral agenda in considerable detail: NAFTA, drugs, and migration. They argue that, generally speaking, international influences appear to be having a net positive impact on democracy.

The authors provide a foundation for analyzing political changes in the last decade, laying out important legacies of postrevolutionary development, the most significant of which are the lack of democracy and social/economic inequality. They provide an accurate and helpful interpretation of the rise of political competition, and they identify and give appropriate attention to newly active institutions under the rubric of organizational freedom. The Catholic Church deserves somewhat more attention in relation to its impact on the changing electoral process, as distinct from its recent, critical voice as a political actor, which they develop insightfully.

One of the strengths throughout this book is that it creates a careful structure for analysis by outlining and identifying, through chapter headings and imaginative subtitles, the fundamental issues that have molded the recent democratic process. The coherency of their overall arguments is linked strongly together throughout all of the chapters. Despite Mexican achievements to date, the authors see two major obstacles to a functioning democracy. First, it still must confront profound social inequalities (half of Mexico's population can be classified as poor). Second, the consolidation of democracy relies on institutions that have not yet developed democratic roots as deep as those that sustained authoritarianism for seven decades.

Any reader hoping to understand political developments in Mexico through 2000 will find this book invaluable. The authors were able to incorporate Fox's electoral victory into the text, given the publication date, but unfortunately they did not have an opportunity to analyze his surprise win at the polls or the consequences of PRI's defeat and the installation of a new administration. Despite the major changes the National Action Party (PAN) administration now poses for Mexico, domestic and foreign, this work is a gold mine of thoughtful interpretations of the Mexican experience, placed effectively within the larger setting of the democratic transformation literature.

Market and Community: The Basis of Social Order, Revolution, and Relegitimation. By Mark I. Lichbach and Adam B. Seligman. University Park: Pennsylvania State Press, 2000. 177p. $35.00 cloth, $14.95 paper.

Mark Blyth, Johns Hopkins University

Market and Community is both more than the sum of its parts and less than what it promises. The book is more than the sum of its parts since it is a more a sequence of independent thoughtful essays than a unitary thesis. It is, however, less than what it promises because the links between the analytic and the empirical chapters are less than perfectly specified.

Market and Community revisits Brian Barry's distinction between economistic and sociological understandings of order. The authors argue that, for rationalists, order is traditionally seen as a function of individual choices and unintended consequences that generate invisible hand pressures for spontaneous order. Meanwhile, for culturalists, order cannot be generated from such methodologically individualist premises and is instead seen as a property, not of markets, but of community. Such a division is a well-established one, and here the conversation usually ends. To the authors' credit, this is where they begin.

The core of the book is the second chapter, "Analytic Approaches to Social Order." Beginning with an excellent discussion of why different explanations of order ultimately rest upon very different conceptions of the "self," the authors develop a typology of alternative solutions to the problem of order along two dimensions; deliberation (Is order planned or unplanned?) and ontology (Is such an order spontaneous or contingent?) Mapping this out, four solutions to the problem of order present themselves: market, community, contract, and hierarchy. The key contribution of this chapter is to show why each of these solutions fails to explain order adequately. Market solutions fail since they presuppose the society they seek to explain; community solutions fail since common values rest upon prior exchanges and contracts; contract approaches fail since they rest at base on prior notions of what is legitimate—a community property; while hierarchy fails for the simple reason that force alone never works. This chapter is an excellent theoretical primer and tour de force on the limits of different social theories.

Yet after this impressive beginning the book becomes less than what it promises, for the next two chapters sit rather oddly with the foregoing discussion. Ostensibly, chapters 3 and 4 attempt to locate these insights in the study of revolution and regime building. However, here the authors fall short. While chapter 3 provides an excellent summary of the main theories of revolution and a critical exegesis of their shortcomings—a chapter that is sure to become a comps exam review classic—the point of doing so remains opaque. Having already specified why partial theories logically cannot provide sufficient explanations in the previous chapter, showing why everyone from Charles Tilly to Jock A. Goldstone indeed makes such errors adds little to the analysis, unless one is going to provide an alternative, which the authors do not do. Instead they provide a theory of postrevolutionary regime consolidation, which is something rather different from a theory of revolution. Given this, one cannot help but ask exactly how this is related to the previous chapters or even if this is a fair criticism of other theories of revolution. For example, does a theory of the origins of empires have to account for their dissolution too? Nonetheless, chapter 4 provides us with a very interesting theory of how postrevolutionary stability is created. Postrevolutionary stability is explained utilizing a metaphor of entering, negotiating in, and exiting a "room." In this room, if elite expectations are congruent, resources are fungible, and if the bargains struck can be maintained, then a liberal type polity results. If not, an authoritarian reaction develops. These propositions, and the subsequent brief case studies, fail to satisfy on two levels. First, how this approach obviates the problems discussed in chapter 2 is unclear. It is unclear if the authors are attempting to transcend the four perspectives analyzed previously or are simply rehashing them. Second, some of the explanatory variables seem more descriptive than analytic. To take one example, the authors argue that to get into the "room" one must have "a statistically normal distribution of elite opinion" (p. 100). Moreover, size matters. The more "moderates" there are, the more agreement there will be. But this raises the question, Isn't a statistically normal distribution of elite opinion (where most people are moderate) precisely a description of a nonrevolutionary situation? If so, is this an explanation of how one constructs order, or a description of order?

While the empirics of the book fail to satisfy completely, its analytic strength comes roaring back in chapter 5. This chapter takes the form of a dialogue between the authors that ranges across issues of identity, preference falsification, reductionism, practice versus choice, the historicity of markets and self-interest, and a host of other topics. The dialogue is a joy to read and the passion of the authors shines through. If one ever wants a piece that explains to students what is at stake in the debates over rational choice theory and its alternatives, I can think of nothing better. However, the placement of the dialogue, coming as it does it at the end of the volume, adds to the sense of disconnect from the middle chapters and, thus, strengthens the sense of Market and Community being less a single argument and more two different conversations.

In fact, it is a shame that the dialogue ends the book rather than begins it. It would be a wonderful setup chapter for why market, community, contract, and hierarchy solutions are seen as alternatives and, indeed, what is at stake, or better, what is missing, in each of these perspectives. This would make the second chapter even more powerful and perhaps support the sections on revolution and relegitimation a bit better. Market and Community pushes the "rationalist" versus "culturalist" debate beyond the usual long-range oratorical bombardment and into truly fertile ground. And while it fails to satisfy completely as a theory of revolution and relegitimation, as an analytic discussion of order, it is superb.

The Social Movement Society: Contentious Politics for a New Century. Edited by David S. Meyer and Sidney Tarrow. Lanham, MD: Rowman and Littlefield, 1997. 282p. $68.50 cloth, $24.95 paper.

Social Movements in Politics: A Comparative Study. By Cyrus Ernesto Zirakzadeh. London: Addison Wesley Longman, 1997. 288p. $32.00

Jillian Schwedler, University of Maryland

What does protest means in industrial societies? To answer this question, David Meyer and Sidney Tarrow bring together political scientists and sociologists from Europe and the United States to build on comparative insights. The 17 contributors include some of the most prominent voices in the study of contentious politics as well as a few new ones. Some chapters are organized around case studies (Klandermans, Roefs, and Olivier on the African National Congress; Rucht on protest in Germany; and McCarthy and McPhail on protest in the United States), while others compare across cases (Crozat on Western democracies; Della Porta, Fillieule, and Reiter on policing in France and Italy; Kubik on Central Europe; Hipsher on Latin America). The editors' introduction and the final two chapters (Katzenstein on feminist movements; Keck and Sikkink on transnational advocacy networks) advance cross-regional comparisons.

The editors advance three claims: (1) Protest is a more routine part of life in industrialized societies, (2) more protests address more diverse constituencies, and (3) professionalization of movements has led to a fundamental change in the character of protest in industrialized societies. They argue that new repertoires of contention have emerged, ranging from spontaneous protests by students and laborers advocating greater social justice and economic equality to carefully planned demonstrations led by party leaders and wealthy industrialists and supported by middleclass actors (pp. 1–4). Tactics have also spread geographically, within nations as well as cross-nationally and into transnational spheres.

Many of the contributors agree that protest has become institutionalized and professionalized, but with some interesting twists. In Kubik's study of four cases from Central Europe, she argues that the institutionalization of protest has not resulted in a shift from direct collective action (e.g., protests, strikes) to strategies of lower mobilization and less disruption (e.g., petitions); rather, direct action has itself been institutionalized (p. 148). In his study of Germany, Rucht argues that professionalization has not resulted in deradicalization. While it is true that "demands for fundamental social and political change" were largely absent from protest movements by the 1980s (p. 49), the proportion of illegal and violent protests actually increased. Klandermans, Roefs, and Olivier reach similar conclusions. South Africa's political transition has brought decreased overall levels of political engagement, including within political parties, but this has not meant a "demovementization" of society (p. 191). For those who remain engaged, the level of participation is likely to be much higher.

Katzenstein presents a comparison of feminist activism within the military and the Church. She critiques conceptions of institutionalization that suggest a cessation of fundamental challenges to the system. Instead, the character of institutional location (habitat) may structure the form that protest takes, but it does not necessarily deflate its potential to bring about significant change. Hipsher also focuses attention on context. In Chile and Brazil, more disruptive and contentious forms of protest gave way as movements began to work almost entirely within state structures to achieve their goals (p. 168). In Chile, however, the institutionalization of dissent has resulted in more exclusionary politics; Brazil has seen the incorporation of movements within the system. This conclusion illustrates that the institutionalization of protest is fundamentally linked to state responses.

Two chapters focus explicitly on the changing role of the state, particularly the evolving policing practices. Della Porta, Fillieule, and Reiter argue that in France and Italy, police management of protest events has indeed changed over the past decades, from practices of intimidation to "minimalistic bargaining" with protestors (p. 125). As McCarthy and McPhail illustrate in their study of protest in the United States, the police tolerate minor violations of the law, and often even cooperate and coordinate with protestors to ensure "successful" events for all involved. Not only has the social organization of protest evolved into institutionalized forms over the past decades (p. 100), but so has policing of protests, from "escalated force" to "negotiated management" (p. 96).

This volume makes an important contribution to our understanding of contentious politics in industrialized societies and offers some counterintuitive conclusions. For the most part, the contributors agree that protest in industrialized societies has indeed become largely institutionalized but not tamed.

Rather, societies appear to be more accustomed to protest, and many states work hard to ensure the rights of citizens to express their diverse views. However, Crozat provides an important check on the enthusiasm such conclusions might evoke. Routinization of protest activities in everyday life, he argues, has not produced a corresponding change in public attitudes toward protest. In fact, tolerance of protest activities has perhaps decreased, rather than increased (p. 60).

What are the implications of these developments for civil society globally? Della Porta, Fillieule, and Reiter's conclusions suggest that policing trends strengthen civil society, particularly as antagonistic relationships, even between protestors and police, are framed as engagements among citizens (p. 128). Kubik's study cautions that institutionalization may not mean a strengthening of civil society if the latter is defined by the primary resort to democratic means to address political grievances. Yet if protest itself is considered part of civil society, then the institutionalization of protest is a positive force. Hipsher's conclusions imply that institutionalization of social movements can have contrary effects on civil society: If movements are institutionalized into only forms such as political parties, the outcome is less democratic than if a wide range of movements and tactics are institutionalized. And as Keck and Sikkink's study suggests, transnational social movement networks are already changing the shape of global civil society.

In another recent work on contentious politics, Cyrus Ernesto Zirakzadeh provides a fascinating comparative study of three social movements in very different contexts: the West German Greens (an electoral party movement), Poland's Solidarity (a movement that emerged under an authoritarian system), and Peru's Shining Path (a movement that emerged in a nonurban and nonindustrial context). The author states that the book is intended both as a primer on the current state of social movement theory and as a comparative study aimed at advancing a new theory. It is only partially successful on both counts, but the comparative study provides much rich ground that clearly merits serious attention.

In the first section, Zirakzadeh characterizes what he sees as three generations of social movement theory over the past century: Social movements have been theorized as (1) responses to modernization, (2) responses to structural inequalities, and (3) products of identity struggles. The second section (actually three parts) examines each of the cases in light of these three generations of social movement theorists. The final section highlights the comparative findings, assesses the weakness of existing theoretical approaches for making sense of these cases, and argues for a foruth generation of theorizing. This new approach would "focus on (1) the plural viewpoints, interests, and ambitions that exist within any movement; (2) the conflicts over goals, priorities, and activities that naturally arise from members' different interests and aims; and (3) the methods that leaders use to reduce friction among activists and to promote agreement and unity" (p. 239).

Zirakzadeh overstates the originality of this approach, and he seems to suggest that only scholars of "identity-formation theory" have systematically attended to the importance of cultural factors. As much earlier work (e.g., Bert Klandermans, Hanspeter Kriesi, and Sidney Tarrow, International Social Movement Research, Vol. 1, 1988; Sidney Tarrow, Power in Movement: Social Movements, Collective Action, and Politics, 1994; Doug McAdam, John McCarthy, and Meyer Zald, Comparative Perspectives on Social Movements, 1996) illustrates, the trend among social movement theorists since at least the early 1990s has been to combine the insights of political opportunity structures and resource mobilization with the study of cultural factors, not only identity but also ideology, beliefs, dominant narratives, discourse, and framing processes. Few, if any, argue that any of these earlier "generations" of theorizing alone provide a sufficient explanatory model, though they may focus attention on different explanatory factors.

However, the strength of Zirakzadeh's analysis is in stressing the need to pay close attention to the internal dynamics of social movements ranging from militants to political parties and across diverse contexts. Particularly valuable is his detailed examination of ideological debates within each party. Without attention to internal party politics, one would not recognize the extent to which debates over ideological orientation structure the behavior of these diverse movements. One would have liked to see more of the book focus on the details of his proposed "fourth generation" theory, which is implicitly developed in the case studies but formally stated only in the last 2.5 pages of the book. Nevertheless, this study is an important contribution to the growing and extremely important body of scholarship that compares social movements in very different contexts (e.g., Gay Seidman, Manufacturing Militance: Workers' Movements in Brazil and South Africa, 1994; Elisabeth Wood, Forging Democracy from Below: Insurgent Transitions in South Africa and El Salvador, 2000; Misagh Parsa, States, Ideologies, and Social Revolutions: A Comparative Analysis of Iran, Nicaragua, and the Philippines, 2001).

Conservative Parties, the Right, and Democracy in Latin America. Edited by Kevin J. Middlebrook. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2000. 408p. $59.95 cloth, $21.00 paper.

Nancy R. Powers, Florida State University

Given the Right's historic record of undermining democracy in Latin America, Kevin Middlebrook organized a conference in 1996 to examine its adjustment to the democratic rules of the posttransitions, post-Cold War era. This work began in that conference and is part of the editor's larger research program.

Middlebrook begins with an extended introduction to the research problem and the contributors' findings. Case studies by prominent country specialists follow, encompassing Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, El Salvador, Peru, and Venezuela. The editor's conclusion identifies questions for future research, followed by a marvelous appendix.

Edited volumes are notoriously tricky. This one's occasional flaws are outweighed by its many contributions. One strength is the consistent structure across the chapters, each of which gives an historically grounded account of the Right's place vis-à-vis the larger party and political systems.

In content, the chapters are largely unified by a focus on how socioeconomic elites accommodate themselves to democracy. (The major exception is the Brazil chapter, added after the initial conference.) Middlebrook's underlying premise, drawing from Dietrich Rueschemeyer, Evelyne Huber, and John Stephens' work (Capitalist Development and Democracy, 1992) and also consistent with Guillermo O'Donnell and Philippe C. Schmitter (Transitions from Authoritarian Rule: Tentative Conclusions about Uncertain Democracies, 1986), is that democratic survival requires competitive conservative parties or other means within the party system, so that elites feel able to protect their class interests (cf. pp. 5 and 110). Scott Mainwaring, Rachel Meneguello, and Timothy Power argue that the Brazilian case only partially supports the premise (see pp. 217-19). Atilio Borón, Michael Coppedge, and John Dugas each argue that the Right has not necessarily needed its own party to protect itself in Argentina, Venezuela, or Colombia, respectively. In Argentina, the Right has counted on the military and other proxies. In Venezuela and Colombia, the Right protected its interests via clientelistic relationships with centrist party politicians—although in both cases, the decline of those centrist parties threatens the Right's continuing capacity to protect itself without its own party. Middlebrook concludes that while post-Cold War conditions may help the Right feel less vulnerable than in the past, nevertheless, a viable party would be the best means to its long-term sense of security under democratic rules. At the same time, he acknowledges the concerns of several contributors that the quality of that democracy may suffer when elites are electorally strong and able to use the democratic process to restrict civil liberties or social policy reforms (see pp. 286–88).

A key finding in the work is the variation, across both time and region, in the ways in which and degrees to which socioeconomic elites access power. Manuel Antonio Garretón argues that backward-looking extremists attached to the pinochetista past pull Chile's two Rightist parties outside the mainstream. This makes them a "permanent electoral minority," poorly able to represent elites' interests (although oddly, his last paragraph calls into question the permanency of this minority status [pp. 72–79]). Elisabeth Wood explains how most Salvadoran elites came to be forward looking—discovering democracy as a feasible means to defend their new interests in the post-civil war economy, via the successful ARENA party.

In Peru, the Peruvian transnational business sector managed to convince former President Fujimori to enact their economic policy priorities, but Catherine Conaghan says that they then found themselves discombobulated by Fujimori's popularity and locked out of decisions by his authoritarianism. Argentine business elites likewise used an electorally popular agent, Carlos Menem, to enact their economic program. Atilio Borón, however, sees them as contentedly ruling from behind the scenes, without need for a political party, thanks to their capacity to pressure the state and to control key institutions of civil society.

Michael Coppedge argues (controversially) that Venezuela had no conservative party, but he shows how voters became alientated by the factionalism, clientelism, and economic failures of the long-established centrist parties. Those parties virtually disappeared, supplanted by Hugo Chavez's populism, and leaving elites with neither informal nor formal representation. For similar reasons, but less severely, Colombia's traditionally strong Conservative and Liberal parties are losing electroal support. John Dugas argues that the National Front system they created to share their power and defend the elite economic interests has resulted in a self-preserving political class deaf to the interests and alienation of the popular sectors.

While largely unified in focus, the chapters are not unified on the meaning of the title concept, "conservative parties." Inconsistent terminology is problematic for readers who believed Middlebrook's introductory statement that "conservative parties are defined here as parties whose core constituencies are upper social and economic strata but that mobilize multiclass electoral support in a common political project" (p. 3). Readers eventually discover (e.g., in Coppedge's chapter, footnote 18) that "here" does not refer to the entire book. Mainwaring, Meneguello, and Power are, at least, explicit. They reject the core constituency definition, because the parties that Brazilians perceive as advocating conservative positions often draw disproportionate support from lower-class voters, not elite strata (pp. 165–67).

This conceptual pluralism not only is confusing, but also impedes the kind of cross-regional theorizing that Middlebrook attempts in the first chapter. How can we draw conclusions about the formation of conservative parties from case studies that did not define those parties in a consistent way?

Middlebrook's focus on elite core constituencies comes from an innovation proposed by Edward Gibson (Class and Conservative Parties, 1996). The innovation in focus is a good one—elites protecting their economic and social interests, not conservative norms per se, were the key threat to Latin America's liberal democracies in the last century, making a compelling case for research on those elites' "accommodation" to democracy. Yet calling elites "conservatives" is a serious semantic problem, because it flies in the face of conventional usage. Even the editor does not use "conservative" solely to indicate the party's core of support. For example, both liberal and conservative parties in the nineteenth century were dependent upon and protective of socioeconomic elites. What made one "conservative" was its alliance with the Catholic Church on moral issues and church prerogatives. As I read Middlebrook's introduction, their ideological and programmatic positions, not their core constituency, distinguished them as "conservative."

This is a nuanced and sophisticated book. While it repays a close reading, it also requires one, particularly chapters 1, 2, 5, and 6. Readers not well versed in the parties literature may be frustrated, as key points are easily missed amid jargon, detail, and sometimes rather nonlinear argumentation.

This book does not yet build a theory of the Right under democracy but, rather, seeks to identify the essential empirical and conceptual elements of such a theory. All of the chapters are insightful in their own ways, some drawing more heavily on their author's previous work than others. Mainwaring, Meneguello, and Power's unusually long piece is a tour-de-force on the Brazilian Right, including substantial new statistical analyses of its social bases.

This should be an essential reference for any scholar or graduate student studying party systems, conservatism, economic elites, or democratization in Latin America. The statistical appendix alone (pp. 293–328) is an asset. Prepared by Eric Magar and Kevin Middlebrook, the 19 tables provide hard-to-find election results for every national-level democratic election of the 1980s and 1990s in the seven countries, including very minor parties and identifying which are conservative (using Coppedge's definition).

Coalition Governments in Western Europe. Edited by Wolfgang C. Müller and Kaare Strøm. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000. 602p. $90.00.

Christopher S. Allen, University of Georgia

This comprehensive volume analyzing Western European government coalitions from 1945 until 1999 is an impressive and meticulously researched work. Using a uniform, crossnational collection of data the authors examine both the governing institutions and the patterns of conflict resolution in the 13 Western European democracies that have experienced coalition government during the post-World War two years.

In a series of standardized tables that the editors established for the contributors, this volume provides clear comparable data on electoral performance, cabinet formation membership, and termination of these countries governing coalition's for the last half-century. In addition to this extremely valuable data, the contributors also placed their empirical findings within an analytical framework that recognizes the significance of political institutions and their role in both enhancing and constraining the performance of governing coalitions.

The editors began this study with the observation that 13 of the 16 major parliamentary governments in Western Europe have relied upon coalitions to govern their societies for anywhere from 20% to 100% of the post World War II period. Thus, any systematic comparison of developed democracies requires a comprehensive understanding of coalition performance.

The two primary goals of the volume are, first, to alleviate the 10-year absence of comparable data on coalition politics since the last wave of similar studies was completed over a decade ago and, second, to make a theoretical contribution to the study of coalition bargaining and politics in the tradition of game theoretical and rational choice methodologies. The editors specifically state that, while they will be happy to fulfill the first objective, their major ambition is to accomplish the second.

Unfortunately from the editors' perspective, they are much more successful with the former than the latter. The editors state in their introduction that the book is based on general and fundamental notions about the politics of coalition, namely, that it is (1) strategic, (2) manifested as a game between political parties, (3) institutionally conditioned, and (4) governed by anticipation. With such a goal, a reader might have assumed that the editors would position their work to evaluate political parties—the building blocks of coalitions within an explicitly rational choice perspective. Yet rather than examine the individual motivations of cabinet members, provide a horizontal evaluation of intraparty politics, or use a hierarchical model in which followers impose constraints on their leaders, the editors opt for the more traditional, nonrational choice approach of treating parties as unitary collective actors (pp. 6-7). They state that explicit rational actor models would prove "daunting" due to the "complexity" of the exercise, making theoretical analysis "intractable."

Ultimately, they conclude that "empirical knowledge of the real work of cabinet politics firmly suggests that party unity is so much more the rule, rather than the exception" (p. 7). Thus they assume that "leaders of a political party may have a collective interest in cohesive behaviour vis-a-vis other parties." Why is this surprising? Isn't this what parties do? More specifically, why raise rational choice theoretical expectations that will be addressed only in "future studies"? If a rational choice perspective has something compelling to offer the study of coalition politics, why not offer it here?

These theoretical shortcomings notwithstanding, this volume is a superb reference work that scholars of developed democracies will cite for years. In their concluding chapter, the editors report several significant findings for understanding governance in parliamentary democracies. Among these are

- that coalitions account for 69% of the cabinets among the countries studied in the postwar period;
- that minority governments represent 37% of the cabinets and that the median legislator thesis—a common component of rational choice findings in similar, but more limited, studies—does not prove robust in this one, since coalition politics is not always unidimensional;
- that minority governments have been less likely to include the median position than majority ones and that the formation of coalitions—and the formation process leading to them—is often as important as the final results;
- that the formation attempts can be grouped in three categories—ones in which elections largely decide coalitions (Portugal, Germany, Sweden, Ireland, Norway, France), ones in which coalitions are made after elections but with expectations about the likely outcome (Italy, Luxembourg, Denmark), and ones in which the

- postelection negotiation process among parties with a wide range of choices is significant (Belgium, Finland, The Netherlands); and
- that the dissolution of cabinets can take both technical and discretionary forms—the former representing 39% and the latter 61%—and the differences are cross-nationally significant, with Ireland, Belgium, and—of course—Italy having more than 75% of the latter.

While all of the individual country chapters are expertly done, with rich attention to detail in developing comparable data, several stand out for their analysis of counterintuitive phenomena. Thomas Saalfeld's chapter on Germany tells the story of a party system with a healthy dynamic tension; one that has produced stable governing coalitions that only alternate power after several successful terms in office. At the same time, new parties have attained representation and—in the case of the Greens—participated in coalition formation that few would have predicted when the party made its entrance into the Bundestag 15 years earlier. Also insightful is Hanne Marthe Narud's and Kaare Strøm's chapter on Norway, a country with a "fragile constitutional order" comprised of minority governments with comparatively few coalitions. Törbjörn Bergman also offers a compelling explanation for the stable minority Social Democratic hegemony in Sweden. Arco Timmermans and Rudy B. Anderweg examine the apparent erosion of the legendary accommodationist coalitions in The Netherlands due to both the complicated negotiations over policies (aside from the knotty question of which parties actually form the coalitions) and the difficulties in enforcing the coalition agreement. Finally, Luca Verzichelli's and Maurizio Cotta's chapter on Italy provides a well-argued treatment of the country's remarkable transition from one of "constrained coalitions" to one of (apparently) more stable alternating governments.

In short, this is an exceptional piece of empirical scholarship that could have been enhanced theoretically with either a more courageous attempt to employ rational choice methodology or, perhaps, no mention of it at all.

Labor Unions, Partisan Coalitions, and Market Reforms in Latin America. By Maria Victoria Murillo. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001. 250p. $59.95 cloth, $21.95 paper.

Heather L. Williams, Pomona College

In February of 1995, following the disastrous December 1994 devaluation of the Mexican peso, which sent incomes down temporarily by as much as 60% and threw more than a million laborers out of work, the nonagenarian labor leader Fidel Velasquez issued a curious statement. He declared that each Mexican worker (earning on average at that time about six dollars a day) should pledge one day's pay toward Mexico's external debt to show solidarity with Mexico's 24 ailing billionaires, some of whom were now merely several-hundred-millionaires. In a country where jokes are often the most telling form of popular political commentary, nobody knew whether to laugh or cry at doddering Velasquez's exhortation. After all, his long record as an advocate of painful wage caps and government downsizing suggested that he actually might be serious.

Labor Unions, Partisan Coalitions, and Market Reforms in Latin America lends new insight into the question of why leaders like Fidel Velasquez could be so publicly loyal to government administrations presiding over the long neoliberal rout of the working class and labor unions in Latin America during the late 1980s and 1990s. Punishing programs of monetary stabilization, privatization, and trade liberalization hit working people the hardest—sending prices of basic goods skyward, eliminating some of the best blue-collar jobs, and downsizing many popular services. One paradox for political analysts is why any rational labor leader would acquiesce to policies that threatened his or her base of power and political leverage. The answer, according to Maria Victoria Murillo, lies in a multilayered theater of political games and tradeoffs in which labor leaders make choices about costs of the cooperation versus militance and consider the relative dangers of their own replacement by rival union leaders.

Murillo takes up three cases of neoliberal transition: Argentina under President Carlos Menem, Mexico under President Carlos Salinas de Gortari, and Venezuela under President Carlos Andres Perez. Elected in 1989, 1988, and 1989, respectively, the three Carloses presided over sweeping programs of fiscal reform, financial liberalization, and deregulation of their economies. What is particularly notable about these rapid neoliberal reforms, argues Murillo, is that all three presidents came from labor-based parties. In past decades, Argentina's Peronists, Venezuela's ADistas, and Mexico's PRIistas had been associated with protectionism, large bureaucracies, food and fuel subsidies, and ambitious programs of state-led industrialization. One might have expected the party bases of any of these presidents to dissolve from under them as they attacked the strongholds of popular support and, more importantly, the founts of patronage that kept party bosses loyal and voting urns stuffed with votes for their own. Rather than provoke widespread unrest, however, market-oriented policies in each country produced a number of responses over time, ranging from protest to cooperation. This variation in labor responses, contends Murillo, is not well explained by current models of the politics of market transition.

Taking issue with structural theories that rely on macroeconomic factors to explain labor militancy and corporatist theories that point to organizational properties of unions and peak organizations as determinants of labor quiescence or unrest, Murillo argues that the choices of labor leaders in mobilizing dissent reflect labor unions' historical weakness in Latin America's less-industrialized and weakly capitalized economies. Labor leaders who owed their careers to ties with political elites rather than vast support from rank-and-file union members faced an ugly dilemma when their patron parties betrayed their interests. Labor leaders had to choose between keeping laborers quiet and hoping that their party allies would at least mitigate some of the losses to union members during transition or flexing what muscle was left in partybased labor unions by striking or taking to the streets. The problem with the former option, cooperation, was that the government still might throw a sucker punch and leave union leaders with nothing; the problem with the latter, militance, was that resistance might well be overpowered by management or even undermined by rival unions or parties.

Murillo's work usefully expands the literature on labor and market-oriented economic transition, much of which has concentrated on single industries or single countries. A good deal has also been focused on European case studies, whose conclusions often do not model Latin American outcomes well. Murillo's research design, encompassing five industries and their labor centrals over time, is elegant and ambitious, and many of her conclusions about the importance of party and union competition in determining labor choices are quite convincing. For example, there is little question that in Mexico, where labor confederations competed against one another in key industries but operated inside a context of party monopoly, party elites could usefully play union centrals against one another, rewarding only the most pliant. In that country, most sectors remained quiet during the most difficult years of adjustment, and Murillo's framework helps us understand why that was the case. In contrast, labor leaders in Venezuela, who operated in an increasingly partisan-competitive environment in the early 1990s, had greater fears that staying quiet during adjustment would lose them their jobs to party rivals. As a result, they were more likely to mobilize protest, even against their patrons in the ruling Democratic Action government. This helps explain the more halting nature of Venezuela's market liberalization with regard to issues important to labor.

The scholarly conversation on labor's choices in hard times having been widened with Murillo's book, much remains to be done on the subject. The original premise of this study—the paradox of labor-based parties' political durability through round after round of salvos lobbed at the working class and at union power-has fallen apart. A decade or so after the initial events Murillo examined have passed, two of the three parties discussed are out of power. The third, Argentina's Justicialists, reassumed power by default after the meltdown of the country's international credit line and the resignation of its president, Fernando de la Rua, at the end of 2001. Mexico's PRI has been in disarray since PANista Vicente Fox triumphed in the summer 2000 elections, and the AD was left in pieces in the tumultuous new landscape of populist excoup leader Chavez' Fifth Republic Movement in Venezuela. What indeed explains this?

This threefold party collapse points to one problematic assumption in Murillo's study, which is that the labor leaders in question were legitimate representatives of the rank-and-file and that they acted on behalf of their union members while attempting to keep their jobs as labor bosses. In this framework, quiescence is always interpreted as a rational bet on the part of labor leaders that loyalty to the government would earn gains for their membership. This is highly questionable in any number of contexts in Latin America. Certainly in the cases I know best in Mexico, union elections are perennially rigged and union leaders enjoy lifestyles grossly out of step with their official incomes. Even more disturbing, in the fastest-growing portion of the manufacturing workforce—the partial-assembly sector—the most prevalent form of union today is the infamous "ghost union," or false union contract registered with the labor board. This arrangement fills the coffers of national labor confederations but, in fact, serves to keep workers from actually unionizing. In these instances, it may not be as accurate to call people labor leaders so much as extortionists. Until the field of comparative political economy is able to account for relative levels of corruption and lack of democracy in the ranks of labor unions, there will be certain hypotheses about labor leaders' choices that we are unable to test.

National Minorities and Citizenship Rights in Lithuania, 1988–93. By Vesna Popovski. New York: Palgrave, 2000. 255p. $65.00.

Mark A. Jubulis, Gannon University

Compared to neighboring Latvia and Estonia, there has been little attention paid to nationality issues in Lithuania, a country with fewer ethnic minorities (making up approximately 20% of the population) and a more inclusive citizenship policy than her Baltic neighbors. Also, Lithuania's main problems have concerned relations with its Polish minority, whereas Latvia and Estonia have large numbers of "Russian speakers." This means that Russia has been less critical and has not sought to draw international attention to minority issues in Lithuania. As a result, the international community has praised Lithuania's laws for meeting international standards and has given a "pass" to Lithuania when it comes to the treatment of its ethnic minorities. Vesna Popovski seeks to challenge this positive assessment and is motivated by a concern for the actual implementation of laws, as opposed to the mere letter of the law, and seeks to discover the perceptions that minorities have toward their state and its policies.

Popovski's analysis contains many fresh insights based on dozens of interviews and she skillfully presents a detailed portrayal of the key differences between Lithuania's ethnic minorities as well as the subtle differences within each minority group. Popovski's analysis therefore serves as an important warning against the trap of ethnic nominalism: the assumption that ethnic groups have monolithic identity structures and that we can know an individual's outlook simply by knowing his or her group membership. As Popovski clearly illustrates, many different perceptions and goals existed within Lithuania's Russian, Polish, and Jewish communities. Indeed, the heterogeneous character of these groups provides a key explanation for the weakness of collective action on behalf of minority interests during Lithuania's transition from communism.

Popovski's point of departure is that Lithuania's ethnic minorities were unprepared for the emergence of a Lithuanian national revival in the late 1980s and that they felt threatened by the radical nationalism of Vytautas Landsbergis, the leader of Sajudis (short for Lietuvos Persitvarkymo Sajudis, or "The Lithuanian Movement for Restructuring"; the word Sajudis means "movement," not "restructuring" as Propovski suggests on page 51). The various minority responses to the nationalism of Sajudis "... differed in accordance with their support for Lithuanian independence" (p. 79). For example, Popovski identifies one segment of the Russian minority as "Lithuanian Russians" who were integrated into Lithuanian society and supported independence, but another group of "Soviet Russians" opposed independence and supported the pro-Soviet movement called Edinstvo (Unity). These pro-Soviet loyalists were not the largest group of Russians, but they were the most vocal. Most of the Russians in Lithuania shared a common difficulty in perceiving themselves as minorities at all, since they considered themselves to be part of the Russian nation, which was the dominant core of the

The Polish minority has been more active in seeking to protect its rights because this group is territorially concentrated in southeastern Lithuania and many Poles have ancestral roots in this area, which was ruled by Poland from 1920 to 1939. Popovski identifies a split between urban and rural Poles and states that the main cultural concern of Poles is to receive education in their native language. A small rural segment of the Polish community sided with the pro-Soviet Edinstvo movement and Popovski explains that as a result of their actions, Sajudis leaders often referred to the entire Polish minority as "Red Poles" and did not try to win their support for Lithuanian independence (p. 115). Unfortunately, Popovski does not address the interesting question of why a common religious heritage did not create a stronger bond between Poles and Lithuanians.

Popovski sympathizes with the plight of Lithuania's minorities, who were forced to react against the nationalist policies of Sajudis, and she criticizes the leaders of Sajudis, ... who did not push for the development of a democratic culture that would include respect for the rights of national minorities" (p. 73). However, the author does not adequately explain why Sajudis would have adopted inclusive citizenship legislation in 1989 and 1991 if it subscribed to such an intolerant form of nationalism. Furthermore, Popovski believes that democracy represents principles of "plurality, difference and heterogeneity" (p. 11), but she does not consider a minimum set of traits or values that citizens of a state should share in common. Most states are concerned with the loyalty of their citizens, but Popovski does not believe that the actions of pro-Soviet minorities diminished their claims for rights in Lithuania.

The book would be strengthened by placing more focus on the context of Lithuania's struggle for independence. The emotional and liberating atmosphere of Lithuania's "reawakening" period as well as the drama of the tense confrontation with Soviet troops in January of 1991 are completely absent from Popovski's account. The author makes passing reference to these events while noting the radicalization of Sajudis, but she offers little criticism of the attempts by Soviet forces to crush Lithuania's drive for independence. Popovski argues that the emergence of pro-Soviet sentiments among some of Lithuania's Russians and Poles was to be expected due to a justified fear of Sajudis as a radical nationalist organization (p. 100). However, the reader is left puzzled as to why even a small segment of the Poles in Lithuania would trust the CPSU or the pro-Soviet Edinstvo organization more than Sajudis. Even if Sajudis was becoming less democratic during this period, it was clear that Edinstvo rejected all of the democratic values that Popovski hoped to see victorious in Lithuania. A more detailed and realistic treatment of the events of January 1991 would lead Popovski to a more positive assessment of Sajudis as a force for democratic

Furthermore, Popovski explains that the Polish minority had many demands for various cultural rights that it expected to receive from the Lithuanian government, but none of these rights had been granted by the communist government of the Soviet Union. Popovski fails to explain why the emergence of Lithuanian nationalism was perceived to be a greater threat than communist internationalism, which denied basic democratic rights and emphasized the "blending" of different nationalities into a Russified "Soviet people." Popovski also interprets the electoral victory of former communists in 1992 as a victory of tolerance over "the Sajudis policies of conflict and differentiation" (p. 58), whereas most observers at the time interpreted it as a victory of "technocrats" who were more qualified to tackle the problems of Lithuania's economic transition. Perhaps this is one accepted belief that needs to be reassessed in light of Popovski's interviews with representatives of minorities in Lithuania.

In the end, Popovski maintains a critical position toward Lithuania's treatment of ethnic minorities and therefore casts doubt on Lithuania's democratic credentials, arguing that these rights are "the litmus test of Lithuania's orientation towards democracy" (p. 3). However, it must be pointed out that Popovski embraces a maximalist definition of democracy that creates extremely high expectations for a state that recently emerged from decades of communist rule. Following John Keane (Democracy and Civil Society, 1988), Popovski states that democracy "... represents a striving to be openminded, uncompromisingly pluralist, cosmopolitan and historically informed" (p. 9). Therefore, post-Soviet Lithuania fails to live up to these standards because "there was less and less respect for diversity and there was a tendency towards homogeneity" (p. 159). With such high standards, however, we are left wondering whether any self-proclaimed nationstate can also be democratic.

Moreover, by focusing entirely on the negative aspects of nationalism and the Sajudis era, Popovski overlooks the positive legacy established by Landsbergis in leading a nonviolent struggle for Lithuania's independence. Popovski may have reached a more positive conclusion if she had adopted a broader comparative perspective. Although Popovski reminds us that Lithuania has unresolved nationality questions, Lithuania's protection of minority rights appears much better compared to other postcommunist states or perhaps even some West European states, and Lithuania is far more democratic today than it ever was under Soviet rule. We must remember that Vytautas Landsbergis and Sajudis deserve much of the credit for ushering in this new era of freedom and democracy.

Fuzzy-Set Social Science. By Charles C. Ragin. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2000. 352p. $48.00 cloth, $20.00 paper.

Philip A. Schrodt, University of Kansas

The department where I did my graduate training in the early 1970s was bitterly split between advocates of case-study and statistical approaches. At the time, both sides thought the other would fade away—statistical analysis was a fad; case studies, a relic from a prescientific past. But 30 years later, both methods persist, and the debate has recently intensified in response to King, Keohane, and Verba's (1994) assertion in Designing Social Inquiry that the methodology of case studies could be subsumed under that used in statistical research. The polite names for the two positions have changed—"case study" versus "large N" is more common now than the "traditional" versus "scientific" monikers of the 1960s and 1970s; the epithets—"slow journalism" versus "mindless number crunching"—remain much the same.

Into this debate comes a new contribution by University of Arizona, sociologist Charles Ragin focusing on the middle (and thinly populated) ground between the N=1 of the classical case study and the large-N statistical studies. It significantly extends the set theoretic "quantitative comparative analysis" techniques that Ragin (1987) developed in The Comparative Method and is presented as a graduate-level textbook.

The work makes three arguments. The first, constituting about a third of the book, is a sophisticated discussion of case selection—explicitly framed (p. 14) as a rebuttal to King, Keohane, and Verba-using Lazarfeld's concept of "property spaces" (Paul F. Lazarfeld, "Some Remarks on Typological Procedures in Social Research," Zietschrift für Sozialforschung 6 [1937]: 119-39). Qualitative researchers, almost without exception, argue that some cases are more interesting than others and see informed case selection as a critical element of the qualitative method. Large-N researchers, in contrast, see this process as "selection on the dependent variable" that can only attenuate the strength of the underlying relationships. Ragin's arguments for the property space approach are not dependent on fuzzy-set methods and could stand on their own as a contribution to this debate. (Ragin also provides some cautionary notes on the prevailing canonical justification for case selection, John Stuart Mill's "method of agreement," noting (p. 204) that Mill explicitly said that this should not be applied to the study of social behavior.)

The second focus of the book is an extended discussion of logical necessity and sufficiency as an alternative to the additive models that characterize most large-N statistical work. These arguments largely parallel those made earlier by Ragin (1987) and mirror a larger body of work on logical conditions such as Benjamin A. Most and Harvey Starr's (1989) Inquiry, Logic and International Politics.

The remainder of the book extends these set-theoretic arguments to the more recent paradigm of "fuzzy sets," introduced in the 1960s by artificial intelligence (AI) researcher Lotfi Zedah (Lofti A. Zadeh, "Fuzzy Sets," Information and Control 8 [1965]: 338–53). The method has been employed in international relations research for quite some time—for example, by Claudio A. Cioffi-Revilla ("Fuzzy Sets and Models of International Relations," American Journal of Political Science 25 [1981]: 129–59) and Gregory S. Sanjian ("Fuzzy Sets Theory and U.S. Arms Transfers: Modeling the Decision-Making Process," American Journal of Political Science 32 [1988]: 1018–46)—although Ragin has apparently developed his applications independently. Within AI, fuzzy sets have settled into a utilitarian role as one of several methods that can represent deliberately vague decision-making heuristics. For example, many of the microprocessor-controlled components found in contemporary automobiles use fuzzy logic.

Fuzzy logic formalizes degrees of set membership, avoiding the strict "either-or" assessments of conventional set theory. For example, most observers would classify France as a democracy and North Korea as not a democracy. But what about Russia? Russia in 2001 is more democratic than the Soviet Union of 1937, and arguably more democratic than the Russia of 1994, but it is still not as democratic as contemporary France, Germany, or Sweden. Fuzzy-set theory allows the membership of Russia in the set of "democratic states" to be given as a number between zero and one. The theory then specifies a number of operations that can be done with these sets. Some of these operations parallel conventional set theory; others approximate "common sense" reasoning.

The attraction of fuzzy-set theory (to both Ragin and AI researchers) is the ability to deal formally with ambiguity. The disadvantage is the absence of a clear underlying theoretical justification—many fuzzy-set operations are essentially rules of thumb, albeit rules of thumb that allow a car to start smoothly on a cold morning. Epistemologically, fuzzy sets are still at a pragmatic level comparable to the status of large-N statistics in the late nineteenth century, before the intense philosophical debates of R. A. Fisher, Jerzy Neyman, Egon Pearson, and others in the first decades of the twentieth century led to our current norms for statistical inference. On the positive side, the recent "qualitative research methods" movement-instantiated in the Inter-University Faculty Consortium on Qualitative Research Methods (http://www.asu.edu/clas/polisci/cqrm/; accessed 28 December 2001)—may be providing such a debate.

Most of the examples in the text are simplified hypothetical cases. While pedagogically appropriate, the resulting models are more parsimonious than usually will be the case when real data are analyzed. Chapter 10, however, provides two fully developed empirical examples, on protests against IMF austerity measures and on the level of generosity of welfare states. (Ragin's examples generally involve such broad social-political phenomena rather than, say, the life of street mimes in San Francisco.) The methods have been implemented in a software package that can be downloaded from http://www.nwu.edu/sociology/tools/qca/fsqca.html (accessed 28 December 2001). There is no fee for the software, although the code is not open-source and works only on the Windows operating system.

I see two barriers to the wider adaptation of this approach. The first is the sheer complexity of the set-theoretic models, whether classical or fuzzy. Large-N statistical models appear to be parsimonious: Thousands of observations on dozens of variables are reduced to a few simple tables, and most readers only look to see which t-statistics are greater than 2.0. This apparent parsimony actually conceals the incredibly complex assumptions of the estimation methods, but it is familiar. Set-theoretical generalizations, in contrast, tend toward mindnumbing intricacy, particularly when one is not accustomed to Boolean (or fuzzy) algebra.

Second, the least satisfying aspect of the book was the question of measurement. While Ragin mentions the issue, measurement does not receive the same detailed attention accorded to case selection, and one is left with an impression of "Hey, what the heck, it's just an approximation." The implicit assumption seems to be that fuzzy sets represent such a dramatic improvement in validity over the dichotomous classifications of classical sets that their merits are obvious, but an explicit "theory of fuzzy data" would be helpful.

Ragin's set-theoretic work is an important contribution to formalizing the issue of the scientific status of small-N studies. After more than 30 years of debate, the need for multiple approaches is likely to remain. Case-study researchers are always at risk that their cases may not be representative; large-N researchers are at risk that their data consist of subpopulations that behave in a fashion exactly opposite of that implied by an aggregate analysis. In addition, many interesting phenomena (for example, twentieth-century revolutions, states in the European Union, and U.S. third-party presidential candidates) provide far too few examples to generate robust statistical estimates. While Ragin's fuzzy-set methodology is certainly not the final word on this debate, it is an important and accessible addition to the literature.

Timber Booms and Institutional Breakdown in Southeast Asia. By Michael L. Ross. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001. 237p. $49.95.

Alasdair Bowie, George Washington University

With his systematic study of the effects of timber windfall booms on the institutions of four Southeast Asian states, Michael Ross informs the often emotional debate about the relative costs and benefits of "openness" to international trade. Ross investigates the effects of such windfall booms in the Philippines, Indonesia, and the Malaysian states of Sabah and Sarawak on state institutions and finds that their openness to international trade has rendered these states institutionally vulnerable. In so doing, he makes an important extension to the contributions of Peter Gourevitch and Peter Katzenstein, who have focused on the effects that different state institutions have had on national responses to exogenous—usually unpleasant—shocks in European countries (e.g., see Peter A. Gourevitch, Politics in Hard Times, 1986, and Peter J. Katzenstein, Small States in World Markets, 1978). Contrary to expectations, Ross finds that positive shocks (revenue windfalls) have generally corrosive effects not only on the economy (the "Dutch disease" syndrome) but also—and this is the heart of Ross's contribution—on the very institutions of the state. How this institutional corrosion sets in, why it does so, and why the effects prove to be so debilitating are the principal foci of this book.

Ross hypothesizes that when windfall revenues accrue to the state, state officials seek to control the allocation—in the form of economic rents—of these windfalls to others (Ross terms this rent seizing). By control, Ross means establishing direct, exclusive, and discretionary authority to allocate. In seeking to control the allocation of windfall revenues in this way, public officials will weaken those state institutions that restrict windfall use (p. 42). In short, an exogenous international shock leads to changed behavior of state officials at the national level, which in turn weakens state institutions. Ross sensibly limits his study to assessing the validity of these arguments in the four cases, rather than attempting to test their general applicability (p. 43).

In the Philippines, which lost 55% of its forest cover between 1951 and 1986, a combination of increased volume of timber exports and higher prices (in pesos, adjusted for inflation) resulted in windfall profits that state officials in successive governments sought to allocate (p. 83). In so doing, they bypassed institutions created in the early part of the century to ensure the sustainable exploitation of the nation's forests, such as the Bureau of Forestry. Marcos, for example, appointed a series of cronies to direct the Bureau and wield control over the allocation of logging licenses (p. 72). Ross argues that the politicization of the state's forestry institutions and their adoption of policies that led to logging at rates many times higher than the maximum sustainable yield did not result from irrational, short-sighted euphoric behavior on the part of policymakers (p. 3), or from overwhelming rent-seeking pressures from companies or interest groups wanting to capture the windfall. Rather, it resulted primarily from the efforts of policymakers in both executive and legislative branches during the administrations of Presidents Magsaysay, Garcia, Macapagal, and Marcos to seize control of the windfall.

While the Philippines case offers convincing evidence for the undermining of state forestry institutions following a timber boom, Ross's argument that this resulted primarily from rent seizing, and not so much from a "get rich quick" attitude of politicians or from rent-seeking pressures from the industry, is less convincing. Indeed, Ross himself writes, of the period from the mid-1950s to the mid-1960s, that "officeholders held incentives to exploit their influence, and to spend the [timber] windfall, as quickly as possible" (p. 64). Moreover, the treatment of rent seeking per se is cursory, and the reader is left wondering whether the counter thesis (that rent seeking, rather than rent seizing, was the most important intervening variable) has been given adequate play. In addition, for the period under Marcos, the fact that all state institutions—not just those associated with forestry-were politicized (see Garry Hawes, The Philippine State and the Marcos Regime, 1987) undermines Ross's claim that timber windfalls specifically, operating through rent-seizing behavior, caused the politicization of state forestry bodies. Absent this broader context of institutional change, the reader may feel that sector-specific windfalls and rent seizing have been overplayed in Ross'

While the Malaysian state of Sabah in the 1950s and early 1960s had "an unusually sound set of forestry institutions" (p. 88), state officials dismantled these institutions beginning in the late 1960s and seized the authority to allocate rents to others (mainly forestry licenses) so that, by 1991, the World Bank was warning that Sabah's forests were so badly overlogged that the state faced a path to "destitution" (p. 88). Was this a case, then, of the timber windfalls of the 1960s and 1970s stimulating rent seizing, which contributed to institutional decline? Perhaps, but as Ross himself points out, Sabah enjoyed timber windfalls before 1963 (when it ceased to be a British colony) without experiencing the phenomenon of rent seizing or the reduced autonomy of state forestry agencies. This suggests that certain conditions must hold before a resource windfall will result in rent-seizing behavior. Ross argues (p. 114) that such conditions amount to a lack of security of tenure on the part of the chief executive. Implicitly, resource windfalls under conditions of party/leader insecurity (e.g., Sabah under Chief Minister Mustapha, 1967-75) will result in high levels of rent seizing; under conditions where leadership is secure (e.g., Sabah under British rule), resource windfalls will result in no or modest rent seizing. Other potential variables that might further condition the relationship between windfalls and rent seizing are unfortunately omitted. Ross ends the chapter with his strongest case, without expanding upon the significance of such variables for his original hypotheses.

More troubling for Ross's central thesis is the fact that the windfall in Sabah resulted primarily from increased volumes logged, rather than from international price increases, and these increased volumes in turn resulted from policy initiatives on the part of the Sabah government that greatly expanded two categories of logging licenses—annual and special licenses (p. 107). Thus, it appears that the windfall resulted from endogenous rather than exogenous factors. Since rent seizing also is endogenous, this suggests the possibility that the hypothesized windfall/rent-seizing relationship in Sabah is in fact spurious, both developments having resulted from other variables not specified among Ross's initial hypotheses.

The cases of Sarawak and Indonesia also pose dilemmas for Ross's schema. Specifically, while his third hypothesis links rent-seizing activity by state officials with the weakening of institutions that restrict windfall use, in both Sarawak and Indonesia such state institutions were weak or nonexistent from the outset (pp. 137, 157). While Ross argues that adat, or customary law, acted as a constraint on windfall use in Indonesia, and it was this "institution" that deteriorated in the face of rent seizing during the period of Suharto's rule, it is difficult to evaluate this claim. How does one measure the effect of adat as a constraint on windfall use in any particular area? Moreover, Ross's schema is clearly based on the experiences of the Philippines and Sabah, where the institutions in question are indeed state institutions. Unfortunately, this means that those seeking to understand the causes and consequences of the current rapid deforestation of Indonesia may be disappointed by the present volume. As Ross admits, Indonesia fits less well his thesis about rent seizing and its corrosive institutional effects than is the case for the other states covered here (p. 187).

As with all systematic attempts to assess the validity of propositions across a variety of state settings, Ross's study finds the validity to be greater in some settings than in others. The author deserves considerable credit for developing hypotheses that are clear and then seeking to apply them across a broad swath of empirical data covering half a century and four states. To be sure, there are omissions—e.g., the counter hypotheses ("get rich quick," rent-seeking pressures) are not seriously addressed after the first case—and the time frame ends around 1996 (there is little data later than this). And the poor quality of the copyediting in the volume (see, for example, fig. 6.I; "effect" on p. 35 and p. 36, fn 14) will no doubt prove an irritant to author and reader alike. Nevertheless, this book will be found valuable by scholars, practitioners, and graduate students with interests in the effects of globalization on national-level behavior and institutions.

The Search for Good Government: Understanding the Paradox of Italian Democracy. By Filippo Sabetti. Montreal: McGill-Queens University Press, 2000. 288p. $34.95.

Franklin Hugh Adler, Macalester College

Filippo Sabetti has written an important book, not just for specialists in Italian politics, but also for those more generally interested in comparative politics. Poor government performance has often been associated with the Italian state, so much so that foreign scholars often used Italy as an ideal locale to probe the seminal causes of political pathology. Edward Banfield's (1958) The Moral Basis of a Backward Society, for example, attributed poor political performance to the particular beliefs and attitudes of Italians, to an inadequate moral basis he identified as "amoral familism." The village Banfield studied, Chiaromonte (which he called Montegrano), soon became a model for "backward societies" in the comparative literature and later was woven into game theoretic concerns, such as the tragedy of the commons and the prisoner's dilemma. Banfield's "culturalist" approach was later refined in Robert Putnam's (1993) Making Democracy Work. Rather than condemning all Italy to pathological status, as Banfield's Montegrano writ large, Putnam compared the "unsuccessful" South with the civic-minded North, where a density of associations and an abundance of "social capital" not only made "democracy work," but also contributed to economic prosperity. Putnam later extended this analysis of associability and social capital to the United States, most famously in his work on "bowling alone."

Sabetti vigorously argues that the "culturalist" analyses of Banfield and Putnam not only are flawed with respect to Italy, but represent myopic general approaches to the study of politics. More than 30 years ago, formative voices in comparative politics, such as Roy Macridis and Giovanni Sartori, lamented a growing tendency to treat politics as a dependent variable, "explained" by economic, social, or cultural factors. From an institutionalist stance, Sabetti similarly argues against the implied neutrality or even benevolence of governmental forms; these, he argues, not only frame the context within which social intercourse takes place, but are formative in their own right—they serve to capacitate or incapacitate self-government. As the mantra goes, "Institutions count"; they are more than simple backdrops for the political activity of citizens. Some institutional arrangements promote trust and self-government; some do not.

Sabetti forcefully argues that the creation and development of a federalist Italian state, rather than the centralized, unitary one that emerged from the Risorgimento, would have provided precisely that institutional architecture that might have encouraged good government, locally and nationally. Instead, liberal leaders such as Camillo Cavour chose, among hotly debated alternatives, to emulate the monocentric French state model. In the aftermath of the Parisian "June days," which he personally witnessed, Cavour was more interested in unitary, effective social control than local self-government, particularly given the centrifugal potential represented by diverse communes and regions. As Raymond Grew once quipped, types like Cavour sounded like Gladstone but acted like Guizot. Sabetti's hero is Carlo Cattaneo, Cavour's contemporary, who passionately argued for a federalist constitution, a United States of Italy, which would be based upon and draw sustenance from Italy's long-standing, heterogeneous communal traditions. Francesco Ferrara, another advocate for the American model, warned that the preemptory annexation of Sicily, subjecting it to unmediated rule from Rome, would create "the Ireland of Italy" and noted, "It is a common error to attribute more cohesion to a state whose central government takes on tasks that subaltern bodies or individuals can do better" (p. 46).

After reconstructing the constitutional debates that preceded the creation of the Italian state, Sabetti develops and updates Cattaneo's analysis to critique the performance of the contemporary state with respect to the delivery of public services, central planning, and the war on crime. As all fundamental decisions were made in Rome, with little knowledge or sensitivity to local interests, policy tended to be bureaucratic, arbitrary, arrogant, and inefficient. Why? Not because political agents were necessarily incompetent or ill intentioned, but because Italy's institutional arrangements were structurally defective, not because of cultural pathologies or an absence of social capital, but because Italy's institutional architecture inhibited local self-government. Moreover, excessive legislation (often cumbersome, incompatible, and contradictory), emanating from Rome, left individual office holders with tremendous discretion for interpretation and implementation. This discretion, linked to the presence of a large public sector and the dynamics of intraparty competition and fund-raising, led endemically to the clientelism, kickbacks, and pervasive corruption for which Italy became infamous, especially with the dramatic Tagentopoli scandals of the early 1990s. A strongly federal system, Sabetti notes, has firebreaks, as corruption in one unit has a greater chance of being contained and not spilling over into others. He cites Burnett and Mantovani's comparison between Italy and the United States: "Corruption in the letting of contracts for building the Milan subway went from high to low on both the paying side and the receiving side. On the other hand, President Clinton's problems with campaign donations have not engulfed state and city Democratic parties nor endangered Democratic mayors and governors" (p. 262).

A student of federalism in Italy and Canada, Sabetti is also a specialist on the Italian South. In this regard, he questions not only the culturalist arguments of Banfield and Putnam, but the latter's "path dependency" scheme in which North-South differences are deeply rooted in distinctive patterns beginning in the eleventh century (monarchy in the South, communal republicanism in the North). Sabetti argues that Putnam's historical model is overly deterministic and factually inaccurate, oblivious to Southern patterns of associability that continued under monarchy and expanded during the nineteenth century. The truth probably lies somewhere in the middle, as Sabetti does recognize greater social capital and civic-mindedness in the North but cannot convincingly account for it. Perhaps, had he been less polemically inclined toward Putnam, Sabetti would have recognized at least a partial affinity between Putnam's explanation and his own institutionalism, for Putnam's argument, stripped of its excessive determinism, is that communal republicanism was an institutional form that encouraged self-government, whereas monarchy was a form that discouraged it. Be that as it may, Sabetti has written one of the more stimulating books on Italy to have appeared in recent years, and one of the very few in English that reflects the contemporary Italian fascination with federalism that followed from the Tagentopoli crisis.

Religious Minorities in Iran. By Eliz Sanasarian. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000. 249p. $59.95.

Haleh Esfandiari, Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars

Eliz Sanasarian's book is a welcome addition to the growing number of books on Iran since the Islamic Republic replaced the monarchy in 1979. She deals with an important yet little-covered subject: how religious minorities fare under an Islamic government. Just as Sanasarian's first book. The Women's Rights Movement in Iran, broke new ground and added much to our knowledge about of the status of women under the monarchy and the first few years of the Islamic Republic, Religious Minorities in Iran also fills a gap in scholarship. Some books and articles have been published since the Islamic revolution on Iranian Jews and Bahais, but little has appeared on Iran's Zoroastrian and Armenian communities, and virtually nothing on Iran's Chaldeans and Assyrians. No one has treated all the religious minorities in one volume. (Sansarian is, of course, dealing with religious minorities, not ethnic communities such as the Arabs, Kurds, Baluchis, Turks, and others.)

Sanasarian gives us a concise and useful summary of the history of these communities until the 1979 Islamic revolution, before addressing the major subject of the book, the fate of these communities under the Islamic Republic, particularly in the first decade after the revolution. Sansarian notes the continuities but, more importantly, the contrasts in official attitudes toward the religious minorities before and after the revolution. The constitution during the monarchy specified Shi'ite Islam as the official religion of the state. But under the Pahlavi dynasty (1924–1979), religion was being gradually pushed into the private sphere. Under the Islamic Republic, in contrast, religion became a dominant element of state polity, affecting the life of religious minorities as much as of the Muslim population.

Under the Pahlavis, according to Sanasarian, the Shi'ite clerical hierarchy and the government did try to interfere in the affairs of the religious minorities, and harassment was greater in the provinces than in the capital, Tehran. However, she notes, in the Pahlavi period the religious minorities enjoyed improved working and living conditions and a large degree of toleration; they benefited from the Pahlavi emphasis on nation-building, nationalism, and forging Iran's disparate populations into one people. Under the reign of the second Pahlavi monarch, for example, members of the religious minorities were free to practice their religions and cultivate their cultures. Although no member of a religious minority could serve as a cabinet minister or ambassador, in the last years before the revolution there were, for example, a substantial number of Jews teaching in the universities. Members of the minority communities were prominent in business, commerce, and industry. The minorities had their own representatives in parliament (a practice continued under the Islamic Republic). Sansarian devotes an informative chapter to the discussions on the status of the religious minorities during the drafting of the constitution of the Islamic Republic. Zoroastrians, Armenians, Jews, Assyrians, and Chaldeans sent representatives to the Assembly of Experts, or constituent assembly, and participated in these debates. They were urged not to limit their comments to matters related to their communities. (Members of the Bahai faith, which emerged from nineteenth-century sectarian differences in Shi'ite Islam, were not represented, since the Islamic Republic does not recognize Bahaism as a legitimate religion). In practice, these understandably cautious minority representatives played little role in the drafting of the constitution. Article 13 of the constitution granted the religious minorities the same rights they had enjoyed under the previous constitution: the right to political representation and freedom in matters of religion, personal affairs, and religious education. (Reflecting the enormous hostility of the Shi'ite clerical community to the Bahais, they were not even mentioned in the constitution). However, according to Sanasarian, upholding Article 13 was not a priority for the new regime.

Sanasarian notes that the Islamic government continued to afford the religious minorities a relative degree of freedom in matters of religious practice and allowed the minority communities to follow their own customs in the area of family law, where it touched on marriage, divorce, and inheritance. But it interfered in the social, cultural, and educational life of the religious minorities in a major way. Minority schools were forced to place boys and girls in separate schools, since segregated education became the law of the land. The state appointed a Muslim principal and Muslim teachers to each minority school, and the teaching of religion was supervised by the state, creating tension between the community and the school staff. Protests, especially from the Armenian community, failed to change government policy. All teaching had to be done in Persian, a major source of concern for Armenians, who had long kept Armenian alive in their community by using it as a language of instruction in their schools, although the government later relented and allowed language teaching a couple of hours a week.

Members of the religious minorities enjoyed no immunity from the general tendency of the Islamic state to interfere in the social and private life of Iranians. The Islamic headdress was imposed on all Iranian women irrespective of religious persuasion. A substantial number of Armenian and Jewish employees in the private sector and civil servants were dismissed, demoted, or forced to resign. The religious concept of "pure" and "impure" was revived by the Shi'ite clerical hierarchy and non-Muslims were once again described as impure, at least by some of the clergy. The Islamic penal code (stoning for adultery, amputation for theft, lashings for various violations of the social code) was applied to Muslims and non-Muslims alike. Social gatherings of Jews and Armenians were not immune from harassment. The establishment of the Islamic Republic, the imposition of Islamic law, and the focus on religious identity, Sansarian writes, widened the separation between Iran's religious communities and the Muslim majority. Members of the religious minorities tended to stick to their own communities and refrained from mixing with Muslims to avoid controversy. Of course there were individual exceptions.

There were other problems. Sansarian is especially good at explaining the reasons why the minority communities fared differently under the Islamic Republic. The Jews were regarded with suspicion because of the Islamic Republic's hostility to Israel and Zionism. Jews were subject to property confiscations, arrests, and even executions. Over the years a great number of Jews emigrated from Iran. Under Islamic law, conversion from Islam to another religion was punishable by death, and if found out, Christian converts from Islam were treated harshly and in some instances were killed. The Armenians, Assyrians, and Chaldeans fared better but often were not immune from discrimination and interference. Of the religious minorities, the Bahais fared the worst. Agents of the state embarked on a campaign of arrests, kidnappings, and executions of Bahais. Bahai property was confiscated, and Bahais were subject to forced conversion to Islam. Bahai marriage and death certificates were not recognized and had no standing under law.

Sansarian depicts the religious minorities as communities that managed in difficult circumstances. They learned to live with a theocratic system. In the two decades of the Islamic Republic, she writes, the religious minorities "adjusted but also resisted, they bent but stood firm, they educated but realigned themselves with the new circumstances" (p. 155).

The Soldier and the State in South America: Essays in Civil-Military Relations. Edited by Patricio Silva. New York: Palgrave, 2001. 212p. $59.95.

Cynthia Watson, The National War College

This nice, tight volume offers a novel approach to looking at the civil-military issues that have been a major focus of political science and Latin American studies over the past four decades. Using 10 short essays by predominantly Europebased scholars (Frederick Nunn of the United States, Celso Castro of Brazil, and Francisco Rojas Arevana of Chile are the exceptions), this collection stretches the evaluative process of civilian-military interactions in the region. Not merely accepting the bureaucratic-authoritarian model of Guillermo O'Donnell or others, it uses a much broader measure of the relationships in society to evaluate the health of Latin America today. It is a short collection that would be an excellent challenge for new graduate students in the subfield of civil-military relations or Latin American politics.

A notable strength of the volume is the use of multiple disciplines rather than merely political science or civil-military relations to study the transformation of Latin America. Europeans tend to value regional studies, which retains a legitimacy that has been largely dismissed in the United States since the advent of behavioralism; this volume goes a step farther in bringing a variety of disciplines into each of the essays, allowing the authors to highlight rarely considered aspects of civil-military issues. Robben's use of Erikson's basic description of the relationship between a parent and a child in the development of trust is an interesting way to discuss the violations that the Argentine forces perpetrated against their own citizens between 1976 and 1983. His conclusions are much different from traditional political scientific or even sociological views of why this was such an insidious period for Argentina; he deserves credit for pushing us to think about the entirity of the societal and political effects of the mass arrests that violated so many people's safety and sense of well-being during this period. Similarly, Kooning's discussions of the corporate nature of the Brazilian military's view of its role in nation-building is a refreshing look at this behavior that requires the reader to think more holistically about the phenomenon.

With great emphasis on the "national security states" of Brazil (1964–85), Uruguay (1972–85), Chile (1973–90), and Argentina (1976–83), the authors have the luxury of teasing out historical, societal, and political reasons why these states have suffered through periods of such severe and enduring upheaval. Much of this volume's story line is concentrated on Chile, probably because General Augusto Pinochet Ugarte's October 1998 arrest and subsequent detention in London seemed impossible to observers in the region only a few years earlier. While Pinochet would likely never have been considered for arrest in Chile, changes in the invulnerability of the armed forces to civilian reproach had taken place.

The brevity of the essays makes them direct in their approach but does not tie them together very well. The reader requires some familiarity with the importance of civil—military issues in the Latin American context to make the most effective use of this volume.

Although this is an interesting volume, bringing history and theory on civil-military relations together in a refreshing manner, there are a couple of nagging irritants. First, the title includes the term "Essays in Civil-Military Relations" and purports to cover the region. In fact, the collection is focused almost exclusively on the southern cone states and is almost an answer to Guillermo O'Donnell's Bureaucratic-Authoritarian states of the 1960s–80s. Only Cammack's concluding chapter lives up to the volume's title by looking at the whole of the region. Nunn does address the broad range of issues that Latin American specialists have considered during the five decades of interest in this topic but focuses mostly on the southern cone states.

While one could argue that civil—military relations are most interesting over the decade of the 1990s in Chile and Colombia, the latter is mentioned only incidentally and peripherally. Colombia's pattern is quite different from that of any other states in the region but it would seem that a book on the whole of the Latin American context would mention this important case study more prominently.

Additionally, while Hugo Chavez Frias, erstwhile coupmaker and now President of Venezuela, is mentioned in passing, this instance of a coup that came close to succeeding receives no formal treatment. Chavez is the brunt of much joking in the United States but this misunderstands the tragedy of Venezuela today. In a country with a relatively small population and vast petroleum resources, societal conditions have deteriorated markedly over the past 20 years. This is precisely the type of case that would be expected to clarify the uniformed-civilian relationship, and why it has not led to a series of coup attempts—but this goes unnoted by the authors.

The topic is, as several contributors note, not completely closed in South America. As Argentina, in particular, faces yet another bout of economic insolvency, few people expect the military even to contemplate returning to power as they did repeatedly between 1930 and 1983. The questions of civilian competency still remain. As Nunn notes, "It may come to pass that civilian institutions prove incapable of coping with Latin America's various dilemmas" (p. 33). Has history been altered so that these militaries will not take the reins of power again to replace inept civilian counterparts? This book is not entirely encouraging that the militaries will stay in the barracks.

Social Movements and Economic Transition: Markets and Distributive Conflict in Mexico. By Heather L. Williams. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001. 239p. $54.95.

Judith Adler Hellman, York University

Students of social movements have long struggled to explain why insurgencies occur where and when they do. In this excellent study, Heather Williams examines two contemporary Mexican movements—one rural, one urban—as a means to explain why unrest develops, when movements form, and what movement activists are likely to do once they manage to construct an organization and articulate a set of collective demands. Expanding on the work of Doug McAdam, Sidney Tarrow, Charles Tilly, and other scholars who have wrestled with these questions, Williams is concerned with the way in which Mexico's successive economic crises, and the implementation of neoliberal policies in response to these crises, influence the manner in which the dispossessed organize and press their demands on the state.

While the literature on social movements and contentious politics is already very extensive, Williams advances the discussion in this field with her recognition that the liberalization of the economy and contraction of the state provide a new context in which popular unrest may be expressed, even as they shape the form that association takes among underprivileged social groups. Not only do protest organizations find new ways to negotiate with government over the classic distributive issues of prices, wages, employment, housing, subsidies, and social spending, but Williams finds that "movements have continued to pressure the state in historically recognizable ways, but have adapted to changes by organizing along new lines," building alliances with new forces, and "even changing their identities . . . to maneuver more adeptly" (p. 6). Thus, she argues, not only does market transition stimulate many highly visible changes in the direction of policy and the character of public institutions, but the same process of change may alter the nature, location, and stakes of informal protest politics.

To illustrate these changes, Heather Williams examines the development of two Mexican movements. The first is a labor struggle provoked by the privatization of the Las Truchas Steelworks in Lázaro Cárdenas, Michoacán, a megaproject on the west coast of Mexico that represents the fullest expression of the postwar period of concentrated public investment and large-scale urban planning to achieve full import substitution industrialization. Williams shows that the privatization of this steel mill set off a prolonged battle to save jobs and preserve the contractual benefits won over a period of decades by the steelworkers' union. However, when the mobilizational capacity of labor began to flag after 18 months.

the location of protest shifted from the workplace to the neighborhood, where protest movements led by steelworkers and ex-steelworkers centered on housing, environmental, and urban infrastructural issues.

Far better known outside of Mexico is the second case that Williams details. El Barzón, a debtors' movement that originated among farmers in the north-central state of Zacatecas, began by protesting high interest rates and low commodity prices. The movement captured the imagination of Mexicans across the social spectrum (even as it created great excitement among students of insurgent politics!). Incorporating tens of thousands of Mexicans, ranging from industrialists to small farmers, shopkeepers, mortgage holders, street vendors, taxi drivers, small business owners, and credit card users, El Barzón, like the labor and neighborhood struggles in Lázaro Cárdenas, was a response to neoliberal policies and market-related shocks that had dramatically reduced both the income and the prospects of those who joined the protests.

As Williams notes, in both cases, the implementation of a radical new economic policy not only changed the political and economic environment in which protest movements developed, but altered protestors' sense of what was possible or useful to demand and shifted contentious politics out of the traditional corporatist channels and onto a far less stable and predictable political terrain. The feeling that no one can say what may happen next in Mexican politics—a feeling that has greatly intensified since the election of President Vicente Fox in July 2000—is revealed in William's study to be a feature of the Mexican political landscape that can be traced to the development of movements such as that of Lázaro Cárdenas and El Barzón in the years before the outbreak of the Zapatista uprising in Chiapas in 1994 or the defeat of the governing party in 2000.

Thus, in this insightful study, Williams recognizes and explains the highly fluid situation in which wage-based and consumption-based demands mix, even as political actors inside and outside of the formal economy find ways of connecting their protest organizations. In addition, she underscores the irony of a situation in which the conceptual language used to describe the parameters of protest often obscures the texture of the actual activities involved. While social movement theorists speak of opportunity or opportunity structures, Williams's fieldwork reveals that "the term is quite distant from what people in movements experience emotionally or physically as they engage in public assemblies or occupations." In fact, Williams finds that "protest, for most people, is at best inconvenient and at worst terrifying" (p. 21).

Indeed, this is one of the many strengths of this excellent book. Not only does Williams recognize the critical importance of political economy in structuring, if not actually determining, the shape that insurgency will take, but she also identifies the range of strategies and tactics most likely to bring positive results. With an extremely sharp eye for the telling detail, Williams manages to capture the character of a social movement on the ground, noting that the key questions are not always the big theoretical ones but, rather, Who paid for what? Who brought the food and water? Who knew a doctor? Who called the lawyer? and Whose contact leaked the crucial documents?

The Perils of Protest: State Repression and Student Activism in China and Taiwan. By Teresa Wright. Hawaii: University of Hawaii Press, 2001. 192p. $48.00 cloth, $24.95 paper.

Chris Lee, University of Minnesota at Morris

Teresa Wright provides a well-researched in-depth comparative analysis of student movements in China and Taiwan.

Although this is not the only work to look at these movements, this book is a useful addition to the literature because it (1) contains information about the political environment in China and Taiwan in the late 1980s, (2) presents thorough accounts of events from the beginning to the end of both movements, (3) provides valuable information about organizational decision making and conflicts within the student protest groups, and (4) puts forth several hypotheses about dissident behavior that can be applied to other cases. China's Democracy Movement of 1989 and Taiwan's Month of March Movement of 1990 are cases that cry out for comparison. Both movements were preceded by conflict regarding a change or shift of power in their governments, and students in both movements exhibited similar behavior. However, the Democracy Movement of 1989 was ended by the state with the use of violent repression, while the Month of March Movement concluded peacefully and successfully. Both of these cases share a variety of similarities with the exception of their outcomes; therefore Wright seizes the opportunity to review the genesis and effect of student behavior in 1989 and

The book begins with a brief description of the political environment students faced in China and Taiwan in 1989 and 1990. Wright points out similarities in both cases and notes that although the Taiwanese government was less repressive than the Chinese leadership, the illiberal regimes in both counties created atmospheres of fear and distrust, which greatly influenced the behavior of student protestors. The author also discusses internal divisions within the Communist Party of China (CCP) and the Kuomintang (KMT) that affected the outcomes of both student movements.

The next portion of the book includes very detailed accounts of student group's organization and protest activities. Wright first discusses the Chinese case, documenting student activities from April 15 to June 4 1989. She then describes the actions of student protest groups in Taiwan in March 1990. One of this books's greatest strengths lies in this section; the benefits of the authors's interviews with student leaders are apparent. In both cases the author's meticulous descriptions and analyses illuminate the decision-making calculus of the student leaders and indicate how the political environments created by illiberal regimes influenced the behavior of student groups in understandable ways. Wright argues that the political realities produced by the CCP and KMT influenced student groups to isolate themselves from potential allies, created organizational instability, and fostered protest radicalization

Wright concludes by offering suggestions that allow the extension of this work's findings on China and Taiwan to other cases. She finds that certain protest traits are exaggerated in more illiberal and repressive environments, therefore Wright suggests that it may be practical to examine political context as a spectrum ranging from the most oppressive and illiberal environments to those that are the most open and pluralist. "As one moves across the spectrum toward more oppressive regimes, intervening variables of fear and distrust become more pronounced, such that crucial collective action resources of organization and mobilization are stymied" (p. 130). Therefore, the more repressive the regime, the more fear and distrust by dissidents increase, which results in the diminishment of dissident organization and mobilization capacity. A large part of this book's value lies in theoretical arguments that seem to be supported in these cases. Both in China and, due to a lesser degree, in Taiwan, the great likelihood of repression and infiltration by the governing parties created an environment that impacted the realities of student organizational behavior and tactics in three ways.

First, in both cases successful organization was possible only when it was founded on personal friendship networks. Wright argues that in political environments like those in China and Taiwan, organizational networks that are not based on prior friendship are less trustworthy and tend to be plagued by internal suspicion, resulting in organizational instability and ineffectiveness.

Second, an environment of great distrust and fear leads to protest radicalization. The author asserts that protest radicalization occurs in such environments because behavior that is more confrontational is perceived as proof of an individual's commitment to the cause, while moderation is seen as suspicious. The radicalization of behavior can lead to organizational instability and can prolong or exacerbate already tense situations.

Third, dangerous political environments limit protest mobilization efforts. Protestors have to protect themselves from the threats of repression and slander by representatives of the state. Therefore protestors in illiberal regimes may find it necessary to keep their groups from forming recognized ties to outside groups whose membership and tactics are uncertain or to groups who have been targets of state repression in the past. Put differently, the political environment created by illiberal repressive states tends to force protestors to avoid forming connections with other groups, which inhibits a movement's ability to mobilize across various social groups. Hence tactics employed by protest groups to protect themselves ironically may actually weaken the movement's potential influence.

Both of the cases the author focuses on in this book support the three arguments above. She successfully contends that the political environments created by the CCP in China and the KMT in Taiwan greatly influenced the behavior of student protestors in both states. However, she also states that the protest and organizational behavior described above can also be applied to other cases with illiberal repressive regimes. The fact that she derives several generalizable hypotheses from her extensive analysis of student protest activities in China and Taiwan adds to the value of this book's contribution to the literature.

Although this book provides a very comprehensive account of student protest group activity, there could have been more discussion of the impact of the political environment on the overall success or failure of the movements. The author does point out that elements within both the CCP in China and the KMT in Taiwan wished to use the student movements to their benefits. Conservative governing elites in both China and Taiwan wanted to use the student movements to garner support for slowing the pace of reforms, while liberalizing elements wanted to exploit the students' activities to advance their arguments for the expansion of reforms. However, she could have devoted more space to emphasis of the fact that members who favored liberalization in Taiwan's KMT party held more influence within their party and played a major role in the "success" of the student movement in Taiwan, while liberalizing elements were less influential in China's CCP party. greatly contributing to the lack of success of the Chinese student movement. Despite the aforementioned criticism, this book provides several valuable contributions to the examination of student protest behavior in China and Taiwan and to the study of social movements and contentious politics in general.

The Dynamics of Global Dominance: European Overseas Empires, 1415–1980. By David B. Abernethy. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2001. 536p. $35.00.

Giovanni Arrighi, Johns Hopkins University

In The Dynamics of Global Dominance David Abernethy advances four main propositions concerning the rise and demise of European overseas empires over the last half-millennium. The first proposition is that the unprecedented and unparalleled success of European states in building overseas empires in the two long phases of expansion (dated with questionable precision from 1415 to 1773 and from 1824 to 1913) was due primarily to the cumulative, synergistic effects of the extended geographical reach, functional specialization, and ability to work in mutually reinforcing ways of European governmental, business, and religious institutions. In each sphere Europeans faced highly effective non-European competitors. But no such competitor could match the European combination of mutually reinforcing advances in all three spheres. This combination was critical in sustaining not just expansion but also colonial consolidation.

The second proposition is that initially non-European resistance to the triple assault of European specialists in power, profit, and proselytization tended to be ineffectual or even counterproductive. This led to collaboration or, more often, accommodation on the part of non-European actors—"an intensely pragmatic response to circumstances considered unlikely to change whatever one did or thought" (p. 302). Collaboration and accommodation facilitated the expansion and consolidation of European dominance. Over time, however, they gave way to rebellion and a phase of contraction/disintegration of overseas European empires. The book's third main proposition is that eventual contraction was the result not so much of the overextension as of the contradictions of empire. "Consolidation of colonial rule had the unintended effect of magnifying and highlighting problems inherent in systems of overseas governance. These problems made it more difficult for administrators to know what to do and became sources of conflict with colonial residents. Consolidation eventually undercut itself" (p. 327). Problems of overseas governance developed unevenly among different empires. But the multiple political crises triggered by "hegemonic wars"—an exogenous and unexplained variable in Abernethy's scheme of things—had a powerful synchronizing effect across space on the transformation of contradictions into successful independence movements.

The book's fourth main proposition is that each cycle of expansion/contraction left in its wake a very different world from the one existing when the cycle began. The geographical scope of the regional European interstate system expanded, reaching its present global dimensions at the end of the second cycle. Long-distance trade was stimulated enormously, resulting in today's global economy. Populations were reshuffled across the globe, giving rise to communities far more differentiated and stratified racially and culturally than in the past. Last but not least, rapid national economic development became a universal goal, mounting an unprecedented assault on the world's physical environment.

There is much to be commended in Abernethy's story. The systematic comparison of the forces at work in the two phases of expansion and in the two phases of contraction of European overseas empires generates manyinsightful, illuminating, and original observations, such as the analogy drawn between the British North American colonies and India as "precedent-setters" of the first and second phase of decolonization, respectively, and the analogy drawn between the Haitian Revolution and the Rhodesian white settlers' Unilateral Declaration of Independence as "deviant cases" of the phase of decolonization in which they occurred. It is, above all, the details of Abernethy's comparative analysis that make The Dynamics of Global Dominance compulsory reading for anyone interested in the rise and demise of European colonial imperialism.

The weaknesses of the book are, for the most part, the obverse side of its strengths. Abernethy is well aware of the fact that the two cycles of expansion and contraction that he compares present not just similarities but also differences. Indeed, he probably spends as much time highlighting differences as he does highlighting similarities. Nevertheless, the overall emphasis is on similarities. More important, some of the differences between the two cycles that have been most significant in shaping the dynamics and legacy of European dominance do not receive the attention they deserve or are not discussed at all, I limit myself to two omissions that in my view are particularly problematic.

The first concerns the agency of European expansion. In Abernethy's story this agency is pretty much the same in the two phases of expansion, consisting of the combination of governmental, business, and religious institutions noted above. In the case of religious institutions Abernethy does note the change in agency between the first and the second phase of expansion due to the emergence of Protestant churches as competitors of the Catholic church. But he pays little or no attention to the far more fundamental transformations that occurred in the governmental and business agencies that led expansion in the two phases. Like many others before him, he presumes a system of national states and related business enterprises that expands quantitatively but remains basically the same qualitatively. In reality, the system could expand quantitatively only through recurrent fundamental qualitative transformations that created governmental-business complexes of increasing size and complexity. Neither the dynamics nor the legacy of European overseas expansion can be fully understood except in the light of these qualitative transformations—transformations that, among other things, resulted in the relocation of the primary political, economic, and cultural center of "European" global dominance outside geographical Europe, that is, to North America.

Closely related to the above, Abernethy pays little attention to a fundamental difference between the settler colonialism prevalent in the first cycle of expansion and contraction and the colonialism of occupation prevalent in the second cycle. European settlers were not colonized peoples but the colonizers themselves—in most instances the primary agency of European overseas expansion. The peoples of non-European descent who lived in the colonies of occupation prevalent in the second cycle, in contrast, were colonized and no amount of collaboration and accommodation vis-à-vis European rule made them colonizers. At least implicitly, Abernethy does take this difference into account when he compares the processes that led to the independence of former colonies in the two phases of contraction. But he ignores it completely in assessing the legacy of the two rounds of European overseas expansion. The fact that settler colonialism added three and a half additional continents (Australasia, North and South America, and the half-continent of Siberia) to the possessions of peoples of European descent—who, after independence, continued to speak European languages and to welcome the inflow of European people, capital, and ideas—while occupation colonialism left behind no such possessions is hardly ever mentioned; nor is the fact that settler colonialism for the most part eventually resulted in the formation of comparatively or absolutely wealthy nations, while occupation colonialism for the most part eventually resulted in the formation of comparatively or absolutely poor nations.

These are serious weaknesses that are reflected in many dubious judgments concerning the dynamics and legacy of European dominance. On balance, however, they are overshadowed by the book's strengths. There is much one can disagree with in The Dynamics of Global Dominance but at least as much to be learned from it.

Constructing a Security Community in Southeast Asia: ASEAN and the Problem of Regional Order. By Amitav Acharya. New York: Routledge, 2001. 234p. $90.00 cloth, $29.95 paper.

David Arase, Pomona College

Amitav Acharya has produced an innovative and stimulating evaluation of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) at a crucial juncture in that organization's development. Acharya does not shrink from the challenge of measuring ASEAN's rhetoric of regional cooperation against its actual accomplishments, and the theoretical and empirical sophistication that Acharya displays makes this book sure to be a key work on the security and political aspects of ASEAN for academics and policymakers.

At its inception in 1967 ASEAN's commitment to peaceful and cooperative relations among its members (Indonesia, Malaysia, Singapore, the Philippines, and Thailand) inspired some skepticism because there were festering disputes left over from the decolonization period as well as the threat of communist insurgency spreading beyond Indochina. With some encouragement from the West, ASEAN managed to survive its first few years. After the Vietnam War, ASEAN's members sought to become something more than pawns in Southeast Asian security affairs. Although ASEAN failed to mount effective resistance to Vietnam's invasion of Cambodia in 1978, it did subsequently help to isolate Vietnam and the Khmer Rouge regime diplomatically. As the Cold War came to a close ASEAN helped to broker a peaceful settlement in Cambodia. It then created the ASEAN Regional Forum (ARF) to discuss security matters, and it produced the ASEAN Free Trade Area (AFTA) initiative. Borne by the self-confidence produced by these initiatives as well as by the rising tide of prosperity among its members, ASEAN set out at middecade to become a regional organization with comprehensive membership that presumably would allow it to rank in importance with the United States, China, or Japan in determining regional affairs.

What distinguishes Acharya's analysis of ASEAN's development is his use of the constructivist approach to understanding international relations similar to that of Peter Katzenstein in his recent work. In contrast to neorealist and neoliberal approaches (which use models of actors making rational calculations of utility under conditions of objective and external constraint), the constructivist approach gives new life to behavioralism by giving transnational relations an essential importance due to the effect they can have in changing norms, perceptions, and identities. Through this process a state, or relations between states, may be peacefully changed or take on a particular character. In taking this approach Acharya goes back to Karl Deutsch's transactionalist analysis of regionalism and adapts the concept of pluralistic security community (i.e., a transnational region comprised of sovereign states whose people maintain dependable expectations of peaceful change) to the task of understanding ASEAN as a socially constructed security community.

Acharya's constructivist approach is helpful in putting the spotlight on the peculiar nature of ASEAN. It commits member governments to the informal discussion of issues rather than to formal negotiation processes, to decision making by consensus rather than by voting rules, to noninterference in each other's domestic matters rather than adherence to common values and practices, to the nonuse of force between members, and to the avoidance of collective defense measures. Together these and other norms constitute what is called the ASEAN Way, and according to Acharya this has provided the foundation for ASEAN as a security community. Thus, ASEAN is really not a formal rule-making and rule-enforcing organization, yet it has developed common aims such as protecting regional stability against disruption by external actors, as well as norms and a distinctive sense of "we-ness" among its members.

The question, however, is how significant these norms have been. Acharya tackles this issue by comparing the actual individual and collective behavior of ASEAN's members to the rhetoric of the ASEAN Way, and he asks, To what extent has the ASEAN process affected member identities and loyalties over time? The answers are found in chapters in which he discusses how members have dealt with key episodes such as resolving the Cambodian conflict (chapter 3) and agreeing to admit Vietnam, Myanmar (Burma), and Cambodia (chapter 4). Chapter 5 is devoted to intra-ASEAN tensions over disputed boundaries, competitive military modernization (which undercuts the notion of ASEAN as a true security community), divergent economic priorities, and growing differences over human rights. Chapter 6 deals with ASEAN's attempt to manage its security environment through the ARF. Each chapter identifies troubling disparities between ASEAN norms and stubborn facts that have already or may in the future damage ASEAN's prospects. These chapters also contain insightful treatments of the political maneuvering behind the facade of ASEAN unity and are well worth reading on their own.

Acharya concludes that ASEAN has taught its members norms that help to preserve peace between them. In this sense ASEAN-style regionalism has produced a nascent security community. Acharya finds that ASEAN has not been particularly successful, however, in reconfiguring the loyalties and identities of its members, who remain sovereignty-bound actors. And he is not particularly sanguine about ASEAN's future given the internal strains evident since membership expansion and the Asian Financial Crisis of 1997–98, as well as the external pressures generated by Western human rights lobbies and a more assertive and ambitious China. Looking to the future he reckons that "ASEAN...now is in serious need to reinvent itself" (p. 208).

With respect to the theoretical framework of the book there are two minor points one could raise. One is the invocation of Deutsch's concept of a pluralistic security community while discarding his broader theory of transactionalism. That is, Acharya notes that ASEAN preceded, and did not follow as a result of, intensifying transnational interactions and cultural convergence between member societies and that there is little popular support for ASEAN within member countries. On the question of what then created the ASEAN security community absent the conditions Deutsch imagined, the author refers to the learning and socialization to norms that occur within international institutions, which then may lead national elites to redefine their notions of interest and identity. One supposes that here Acharya could have done more with the elite-led, cognitively based neofunctionalism of Ernst Haas.

The other point has to do with evaluating alternative explanations of ASEAN. The constructivist approach does put the focus on norms, but is this approach in the end better at explaining ASEAN as a security community than, say, Michael Liefer's realist characterization of ASEAN as a diplomatic community serving the separate interests of its members in maintaining stability or Donald K. Emmerson's neoliberal characterization of ASEAN as a security regime dedicated to preserving member sovereignty in conditions of peace? It is true that such characterizations tend to rule out the possibility of weakening sovereignty or the formation of a collective identity by individual states engaged in cooperation, but by Acharya's own account the sovereignty-bound national identities of ASEAN's members remain stubbornly intact over 30 years after ASEAN's inception.

Despite these minor quibbles, Acharya has written a vivid and cutting-edge work on ASEAN and the problems of security cooperation in Southeast Asia.

Organized Crime and Democratic Governability: Mexico and the U.S.-Mexican Borderlands. Edited by John Bailey and Roy Godson. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 2000. 271p. $50.00 cloth, $22.95 paper.

William O. Walker III, Florida International University

Organized Crime and Democratic Governability offers an insightful look at one of the most critical and vexing questions of the contemporary era: To what extent is democratic governance possible when it coexists with organized crime? John Bailey and Roy Godson's edited volume analyzes the many dimensions of the deeply entrenched obstacles to democratic stability in modern Mexico, perhaps an ideal case study for such an inquiry. The reach of organized crime there has long tended to undermine the very lifeblood of democracy, namely, its procedures. As a result, throughout the sweep of Mexico's postrevolutionary history, the roots of democracy have not been firmly planted. This chronic condition cannot quickly be remedied. Consequently, the editors conclude, organized crime in its various manifestations will continue to present "a significant challenge to democratic governability in Mexico" (p. 218).

Democracy is not necessarily a lost cause in Mexico, however. Problems with historical origins have knowable and explainable causes and, hence, are not wholly at the mercy of quasi-immutable external forces. Yet as the essays in this volume indicate, the effort to bring effective democracy to Mexico is more difficult than explaining its relative absences. The book's contributors neither engage in model building about the interplay between organized crime and governance nor exactly offer a theory derived from the relationship between the two. Nevertheless, as the editors point out, there exist demonstrable analytical patterns, or images, that might point toward possible corrective action by a Mexican state with the will to address its problems. There are four typologies that help elucidate the crime-governance nexus within Mexico and two that illuminate the nature of conditions near the border with the United States. The former are identified as Contained Corruption, whereby law enforcement at the subnational level is ineffective, even compromised, in the face of criminal activity; Centralized-Systemic (formal), whereby corruption within the central government extends to virtually all levels of law enforcement; Centralized-Systemic (formal plus shadow), whereby a parallel structure exists alongside the central government and abets corruption; and Fragmented-Contested, whereby centralized bureaucratic incapacity tends to compromise local efforts at law enforcement. The other two images or typologies, which pertain to the borderlands, are identified as Marginal Corruption, whereby a professional law enforcement structure keeps corruption relatively in check; and Decentralized, Targeted Corruption, whereby corruption tends to overwhelm efforts at law enforcement in select border regions.

The Fragmented-Contested image is the one found most often within Mexico and along its northern border. Given the historic prevalence of bureaucratic incapacity and the persistent inability or unwillingness of the nation, particularly during the reign of the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI), to address that situation, it is not surprising that Mexico is a site of extensive contestation. At the same time, asserting the primacy of contestation without probing more deeply into, for instance, the structure-agency issue, tends to limit the range of analysis to which these case studies can be subjected.

While the typologies provide a useful angle of vision on crime and politics in Mexico, they do not directly raise several critical questions. It is worth asking whether the democratic processes in Mexico can survive apart from the economic underpinning provided by organized crime. In other words, if Mexico, now under the leadership of Vicente Fox, is positioned to move beyond the PRI's inclusive, authoritarian style of governance, what kind of democracy is possible without the nexus between crime and politics? A related concern is whether the set of relationships between the governing classes and crime is too entrenched to displace. Finally, and more specifically, is the demand for drugs-for profit at home through illegal trafficking and consumption abroad, most notably in the United States—the dependent variable that historically allowed organized crime to penetrate the process of governing in the Mexican state?

Luis Astorga, in examining the long-standing relationships between drug-related crime and the political system, finds that such linkages helped to provide the political system at local levels with a kind of stability that it might not otherwise have possessed. Likewise, Leonardo Curzio sees drug trafficking as responsible for "the evolution of organized crime into a national security problem" (p. 84). Without a hint of irony, Curzio fears as well that the gradual opening of the Mexican political system after elections in 1985 in the state of Chihuahua, which began the process of removing politicians with a sense of entitlement to hold office, might further enable organized crime "to cultivate," (p. 102), that is, destabilize the political system. Indeed, even when non-PRI politicians join the political system at the highest levels, as was the case when the National Action Party's Antonio Lozano Gracia took charge of the Office of the Attorney General of the Republic from 1994 to 1996, it proved difficult to challenge "the ruling elite's impunity and abuse of power" (p. 106) argues Sigrid Artz. Artz finds, too, that administrative incapacity blocked Lozano's efforts to put comprehensive reforms into place, which, in effect, highlights the influence of extralegal relationships upon the nation's political processes. Perhaps no recent event shows the negative consequence of such linkages than the revelation in February 1997 that Mexico's chief drug official, General Jesús Gutíerrez Rebollo, was providing protection for the Juárez cartel. Nor has Mexico's military escaped the taint of association with organized crime, a situation that is not likely to diminish as the army becomes increasingly involved in all manner of issues related to domestic security. Maintaining domestic order, a constitutional mission of the military, has led to the professionalization of the military but not its depoliticization. In fact, contends Raúl Benítez Manaut, at the end of the twentieth century the military was so active in security matters that it raised fears of a militarized state; it did not matter how open the political process appeared to be. Moreover, the Mexican-U.S. border constitutes an attractive environment in which to revitalize relationships between organized crime and local officials of both countries. As Francisco Javier Molina Ruiz shows, there exist "ample opportunities and fertile ground" for the rapid growth of crime along the border because of "the lack of control mechanisms, the dynamics of the border's economy, and the flexibility of the authorities" (p. 199).

While Organized Crime and Democratic Governability may not be the seminal guide for analyzing its subject, when used together with other volumes in this genre, such as Peter Andreas's (2000) Border Games: Policing the U.S.—Mexico Divide, it goes a long way toward charting the contours of that important enterprise.

From Tribal Village to Global Village: Indian Rights and International Relations in Latin America. By Alison Brysk. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 2000. 400p. $60.00 cloth, $24.95 paper.

Margaret E. Keck, Johns Hopkins University

From Tribal Village to Global Village does an excellent job of showing how indigenous peoples in Latin America have gone from victims to protagonists in struggles to control their own fate. Like Alison Brysk's previous work on human rights activities in Argentina during the "dirty war," this book investigates political dynamics involving nonstate actors at the interface between international relations and comparative politics. Key to these dynamics is the idea that "above all, globalization involves the growing presence, use, and salience of information both in national and local struggles and as a newly significant arena of international relations" (p. 12).

Following a strategy that Brysk calls "identity plus internationalization," since the beginning of the 1980s the new Indian Rights Movement has won changes in international regimes and domestic law in such areas as land rights, legal status, political representation, and language issues (especially bilingual education). It has facilitated both market access for indigenous products and greater negotiating clout with mining and oil companies prospecting on Indian lands.

Brysk's fieldwork for the book focused on Ecuador as a "most likely case," because of its large indigenous population, its strong and internationalized Indian Rights movement, and the presence of a variety of international forces. However, the book also presents case studies from Bolivia, Brazil, Nicaragua, and Mexico and refers frequently to Guatemala, Colombia, Peru, and Chile.

The book's theoretical framework combines elements of constructivism with critical theory, yielding what Brysk calls a "critical constructivist" approach. This includes a "normative view of political power in which interaction, learning, and persuasion can transform dominant behavior and institutions—including the state" (p. 29). Within this normative view, Brysk focuses on "the power of meaning" and on a dynamic construction of identity that involves both strategic and symbolic aspects" (p. 39). At the same time, from critical theory she draws a focus on the structural conditions of communication and a recognition that "communication is not merely a transparent and transferable vehicle or resource, but a mode of domination" (pp. 50–51).

Domestic actors deployed transnational resources nationally or took their demands for self-determination, land rights, and cultural survival to external arenas for adjudication. They did so because they had no support at home. International actors—foundations, multilateral institutions, professional associations, and foreign government assistance programs, as well as wealthy individuals—were convinced to support indigenous causes for a variety of reasons. Besides indigenous activists and anthropologists, these included mainly human rights groups and environmentalists. Thus, "modern resources are deployed to defend traditional identities, and traditional identities construct different responses to modernization" (p. 58). At issue is not the desire to remain frozen in time but, rather, who manages "the pace and content of cultural change" (p. 60).

The Indian Rights Movement most often mobilized in the presence of external threats (such as World Bank projects in Brazil). Essential resources included external supporters (the Catholic Church, anthropologists, international aid agencies) and a small cadre of educated Indians, "confident enough to expect equality, frustrated when it was not forthcoming, and skilled enough to lead modern movements in national political systems" (p. 67). The book does a good job of describing the origins and growth of panindigenous organizing and the development of the external network of support.

The problems I found in the book came, oddly enough, both from the book's breadth and from its narrowness. If one of the book's strengths is its broad overview of the phenomenon under study, the fact that it almost never breaks the narrative with a different kind of standpoint is also one of its weaknesses. After a few chapters of thumbnail sketches of particular indigenous groups, institutions, and struggles in relation to the topic in question, the eyes glaze over. I would have liked to zoom in on a few of these examples, closely enough actually to see the nuts and bolts of mounting an international campaign or winning international support. That never happens.

The other problem with the book is its narrow focus on indigenous politics per se, as if that alone could explain how and why indigenous groups were successful in making their claims. I do not know well most of the cases Brysk discusses and cannot comment on them. However, I do know some of the Brazilian cases. I know that the treatment of the Yanomami issue at the level of relations among the Yanomami, the national government, and both national and foreign supporters misses a lot of the story. It misses, for example, the way President Collor attempted to win foreign accolades for dynamiting an illegal miners' airstrip in Yanomami territory before visiting Washington, only to discover when he got there that the airstrip had been rebuilt immediately and that President Bush knew it. It misses the migration dynamics of itinerant placer miners, recently pushed out of other mineralrich areas by the advent of more mechanized production. It misses the crucial role of state politics in the case, in that the government of Roraima vehemently supported the gold miners, and the federal government did not want to alienate the government of Roraima. It misses the great difficulty that indigenous activists had in explaining to ordinary Brazilians why a group of 9000 Indians should be granted a territory "the size of Scotland" (p. 135), while the landless movement had tried vainly for years to win land reform. The fact that in 1997 a Brazilian court found five miners guilty of genocide probably says much less about changing attitudes toward Indians than it does about changes in the judiciary due to the institution of a meritocratic system for selecting judges. In other words, elements of the broader political context—federalism, political economy, institutional change, and symbolic politics, among others, in the Brazilian case—are simply absent from this narrative. We hear almost nothing about what else was going on in these countries at the time these conflicts were being adjudicatedwhat the determinants of the national mood were, what other things would intervene in whether national support was available.

Granted, these are the complaints of a comparativist looking at a study of international relations involving the increasing contact between global and local spheres. However, as more studies investigate transnational linkages and sources of leverage over domestic problems, it seems important to remember that these linkages do not occur in isolation; they are interpenetrated by elements of political life, at levels ranging from local to transnational.

That said, let me return to the fact that for anyone interested in understanding the process by which indigenous peoples have taken a place on the world stage, as well as what they are fighting for, From Tribal Village to Global Village is an essential source.

Diplomacy of Conscience: Amnesty International and Changing Human Rights Norms. By Ann Marie Clark. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2001. 183p. $39.50 cloth, $16.95 paper.

Peter Willetts, City University, London

The claim is often made by political activists that the international human rights system is dependent upon nongovernmental organizations (NGOs). Ann Marie Clark documents this claim with respect to Amnesty International's achievements. The core of the book is a set of three case studies: the development of the Convention against Torture; the creation of the Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances, along with the unfinished story of attempts to produce a convention against disappearances; and the creation of the Special Rapporteur on Summary or Arbitrary Executions, followed by the drafting of a UN "Manual" on prevention and investigation of extrajudicial executions. These case studies are not simply presented as empirical accounts of the diplomatic history. They are structured by portraying each as a four-stage political process, in which Amnesty International collated information on the nature of human rights abuses, built consensus around the principle that the pattern of behavior was morally unacceptable, constructed international norms to express this principle as standards of behavior, and then sought to have application of the norms monitored at both the domestic and the international level.

It is an extraordinary comment on the state of political science that it has taken 40 years since their foundation for the first academic book on Amnesty International to be written. The reason is that its activities do not fit into the orthodox study of either comparative government or international relations. Merely to claim that a transnational actor is important breaks the boundary between domestic and global politics. Clark goes much further by clearly asserting that a focus on norm creation is a theoretical challenge to the Realist approach. It is not supposed to be possible for moral principles to have any impact upon the pursuit of power. Unfortunately, despite the depth of her empirical analysis, Clark makes her challenge in the weakest possible manner, "The moral aspects of international norms cannot be completely subordinated to state purposes" (p. 23). The full application of an analysis of the mobilization of support for principles and norms would recognize that traditional state interests do not have any objective status. The pursuit of security and economic wealth is just a different choice of normative priorities than support

While this is a book about Amnesty International, it does not make the mistake of concentrating solely on Amnesty's activities. The strength of the case studies is that the politics of human rights at the UN is put in the context of changes in world politics, the significance of changes within particular countries, and the nature of the different structures of different UN fora. While Amnesty has a leadership role, so too do other NGOs, UN secretariat officials, UN rapporteurs, and particular governments, notably the Scandinavians. Amnesty is portrayed as having three strengths: its loyalty to the moral principles of human rights, its independent status, and its expertise. Nevertheless, it is just one actor in a complex system.

Clark should have the courage to recognize that her work is a denial that we live in "a system dominated by states" (p. 30). Governments have taken the final decisions, but the decisions they took would have been utterly different if Amnesty had not been part of the diplomatic system. Because of the work of Amnesty, in collaboration with the other actors who promote human rights, governments are now constrained by a complex web of international standards, including legally binding treaties. (However, Clark is wrong to suggest, on pages 24 and 31, that they are bound by signing, rather than ratifying, treaties.) An odd omission from the book is any mention either of the way in which the Convention against Torture overrides the principle of sovereignty immunity or the introduction, under the Optional Protocol, of the right of appeal of individuals to international bodies. These two changes were a revolution in the very nature of the international system. It ceased in law, as it had long before ceased in politics, to be simply an interstate system.

It should be noted that by "principles" Clark is referring to what others might call values, and her use of "norms" is in the relatively narrow sense of generally accepted specific rules for behavior. For example, we have had general acceptance of the principle that "Everyone has the right to life" since the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in December 1948, but there was no international norm for the conduct of autopsies, to investigate extrajudicial killings, until the UN Manual was produced in May 1991. This distinction, between principles and norms, is central to the book and its most valuable contribution to theorizing about the nature of the political processes in international regimes. Although it is derived from Stephen Krasner's standard definition of a regime (Stephen D. Krasner, International Regimes, 1983, p. 2), Clark's use of the distinction goes way beyond that envisaged by Krasner and opens up the possibility of a nonrealist theory of regimes.

Clark has produced a powerful and important work that should be read widely, not just by those interested in human rights. However, if it is to be used for teaching purposes, students should be cautioned that several general statements downplaying the significance of NGOs in the early years of the UN are not valid (pp. 6, 8, 9, 13, 124). Clark falls into a common trap for subject specialists of believing that the role of NGOs in their field is unique and unprecedented. It is precisely because NGOs have been important at the UN since the foundation and because their role has been expanding on all issues that Clark's work has general importance for theorizing about principles and norms in international policymaking. Indeed, if the early NGOs had not succeeded in the first five years of the UN in translating the principle in Article 71 of the Charter, allowing NGO consultations in an interstate forum, into a set of norms for the exercise of participation rights, then Amnesty would never have had any access to the Commission on Human Rights and the standardsetting processes.

The Global Political Economy and Post-1989 Change: The Place of the Central European Transition. By Elizabeth de Boer-Ashworth. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000. 203p. $65.00

Peter Gowan, University of North London

This book attempts to draw upon some heterodox, mainly Marxist, approaches to Western influence on Central European political economies in the 1990s. It also argues that the European Union's (EU's) role in the Central European transformation was qualitatively more positive than the role of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and World Bank.

In her first two chapters Elizabeth de Boer-Ashworth suggests that various Marxist or neo-Gramscian approaches to the influence of the West on peripheral economies offer valuable insights. But this interesting survey of the ideas of such authors (including the present reviewer) is not then followed through with an attempt to employ concepts from this quarter to studies of the changes in Poland, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia (and the Czech Republic) in the 1990s. These chapters instead offer a descriptive narrative of changes in the three Central European states unguided by any very obvious analytical/theoretical framework.

Instead, as the book progresses, a second main contention acquires increasing salience. This is that while the baleful influence of the international financial institutions, pressing neoliberalism, was dominant in Central Europe from 1989 to 1993, the stronger involvement of the EU since then has tended to ameliorate the conditions within the Central European political economies, shielding them "from the worst pressures of international capital and the prescriptions of the IMF" (p. 27).

This second contention, that with the signing of the Europe Agreements between Central European states and the EU their transition was ameliorated, is not convincingly argued. Boer-Ashworth does not make distinctions between macroeconomic trends and microeconomic changes. She therefore does not distinguish the IMF's macroeconomic prescriptions from the microeconomic and institutional changes put forward by the IMF and World Bank. This failure is then linked to her failure to understand the nature and economic significance of the EU's trade regime for economic outcomes in the transition. The IMF macroeconomic policy involved a deliberate and harsh deflation combined with a currency devaluation. This was a macroeconomic policy mix very much along the same lines as IMF Latin American policies in the 1980s, though its impact was exacerbated by the collapse of Central European trade with the USSR. This combination gave the Central European economies one path toward strong economic recovery: export-led growth to the EU market. But the EU trade regime seriously blocked this recovery path by blocking imports in key existing Central European export sectors. Boer-Ashworth entirely misses this pincer effect.

One source of this failure may derive from her apparent belief that the trade aspects of the Europe Agreements kicked in only in 1994 (instead of 1992) (p. 157). The long-term consequences for the Central European economies from the combination of the deep slump and the EU's trade policies are evident in the chronic trade deficits of most of these economies. The main exception, Slovenia, proves this rule: Its export insertion in the EU market had been built up since the 1960s. Boer-Ashworth is aware of the chronic problem of current account deficits. But she seems unaware of the EU's role in causing them.

Boer-Ashworth's lack of familiarity with key economic issues and with the EU's economic program also vitiates other parts of her analysis. She views domestic financial liberalization and the dismantling of capital controls as an IMF/World Bank policy rather than as a policy equally championed by the EU. And although she stresses the importance of financial crises, she does not clearly identify the causes of the main financial crisis in her study: that in the Czech republic in 1997. On page 124 she makes a connection between the Czech current account deficit and the collapse of the koruna, followed by the banking crisis. But she ignores the crucial mediating mechanism between the deficit and the koruna collapse: the fact that the Czech republic had dismantled its capital controls faster and more fully than its neighbors. It had done so partly to take the lead in that field in the race to get into the EU but also to attract hot money into its financial system to compensate for its current account deficit. While missing this key mechanism she later does what she criticizes others for doing in her first chapter—blaming crises derived from the new international regime on domestic failures within the country hit by the crisis: She blames the crisis on instability and corruption in the domestic banking system (p. 127). These problems were universal in the East at that time. What was specific to the Czech republic in 1997 was the faster dismantling of capital controls in line with EU (as well as IMF) norms.

But the most egregious example of the book's blindness to the baleful effects of EU policies lies in Boer-Ashworth's chapter on EU enlargement. She specifically singles out the problems of Central European agriculture as the one sector that she studies in detail. Yet she manages to discuss its problems without any reference whatever to the EU's fierce protection against Central European agricultural exports combined with its vigorous dumping of EU agricultural products in Central European markets.

In sum, after spending her first two chapters packing her bags for a journey into a critical theory of the European transformations in the 1990s, Boer-Ashworth actually travels in a quite different direction: toward an attempted advocacy role on behalf of EU policies toward Central Europe. But her advocacy is weak and flawed. The main work defending (critically) the EU's role, Alan Mayhew's (1998) Recreating Europe is not cited.

At a deeper level Boer-Ashworth tends to conflate the norms that legitimized the various Western policies toward Central Europe in the 1990s with the policies themselves. This basic flaw is no doubt partly responsible for her preference for EU activities: She prefers its legitimating norms and values to those of the International Financial Institutions. But her aim of evaluating Western impacts on other political economies requires a study of actual policies, not just normative theorizations.

In Search of Greatness: Russia's Communications with Africa and the World. By Festus Eribo. Westport, CT: Ablex, 2001. 256p. $79.95 cloth, $29.95 paper.

Laura Roselle, Elon University

In this book, Festus Eribo gives a broad historical view of Russian—African relations and the role of newspapers in communicating Russian and Soviet perceptions of Africa and its people. Not surprisingly, Eribo argues that ideology drove the content of coverage as the Soviet Union attempted to shape opinion according to Marxist—Leninist principles. In taking on the very broad topic of communication, Eribo notes the presence of multiple audiences but describes the content of Russian domestic newspapers in much greater detail than the story of how Russia communicated with African people. While the topic is important, because this book is descriptive and not theoretical, it leaves the reader with more questions than answers about the role of the media in communicating images of Africa.

Eribo begins with a sweeping overview of Russo-African relations that covers pre-Soviet Russian history and the Russian revolutionary press. He notes that by the 1920s and 1930s, Soviet leaders were determined to recruit Africans to the socialist cause and that they encouraged African youth to study in the Soviet Union, a tactic that continued into the 1980s. Eribo raises interesting issues but tends not to develop his discussion beyond a narrative description. He mentions the Sino-Soviet rivalry for political influence in Africa, for example, but devotes only one sentence to it.

Africa was significant to Soviet foreign policy, particularly within the context of the Cold War. In chapter 4, on Cold War political communication and Africa, Eribo argues that Soviet newspapers portrayed Africa "as a tragic, horrible, dangerous black continent" even as the Soviet Union was perceived as an ally of "oppressed nations" of Africa (p. 103). Eribo notes the theme of Russian racism in a number of places, but some readers will undoubtedly want some elaboration on the conflict between Marxist-Leninist rhetoric and racist rhetoric and the relationship of the Soviet press to this. Noting the number of revolutionary democracies in Africa during the Cold War period, Eribo misses the opportunity to analyze more deeply how the media depicted and contributed to the ideological struggle in Africa. For example, Eribo says that while the Voice of America was broadcasting in five languages for a total of 56 hours a week, Radio Moscow was broadcasting in more than 64 languages for 1940 hours a week. But, beyond supplying these numbers, he does not analyze Soviet propaganda in Africa in a more detailed and complex

Similarly, Eribo argues that nonaligned countries did not criticize Soviet information content and policies during the United Nations' New Information and Communication Order debate, focusing attention instead on a critique of Western media. Some readers may want a fuller explanation of how the Soviets were able effectively to gain allies against Western media images of Africa in a way that deflected criticism of their own coverage.

In another chapter, Eribo describes the content of Soviet newspaper coverage through a systematic content analysis of four newspapers from 1979, 1983, and 1987. The data show that Pravda, Izvestia, Trud, and Selskaya Zhizn, at least in the samples taken, covered political news and news from prosocialist African countries more than other types of news or news from other African countries. These data confirm the ideological nature of the Soviet media, yet this is hardly a surprise. In addition to his discussion of what Soviet newspapers covered, Eribo could have expanded considerably on the differences in coverage among the four newspapers. There is a critical absence of interviews and archival data on how and why Soviet media officials constructed the news as they did. There is also no discussion of the racism he mentions in other parts of the book.

This lack of context is particularly glaring when Eribo considers newspaper coverage during glasnot and following the Soviet Union's collapse. Data from additional content analyses (from 1990 and 1992) show coverage to be less partisan, as one might expect. The 1992 data also show that Africa was covered less frequently than it was previously, a fact that Eribo attributes to issues of ownership and financial constraints but for which he presents no evidence. A decline in news about Africa would be expected after the ideological struggle ceased, especially because Eribo argues that that struggle was the foundation on which coverage was shaped. The author predicts that, in the wake of the Soviet Union's collapse, Russian nationalism will replace Soviet ideology in shaping media images, but again, he offers no substantive discussion of this issue.

Although the book has significant shortcomings, the issues under discussion are important to political scientists for a number of reasons. First, as Eribo correctly points out, media images are created, in part, according to specific political and economic contexts. The Soviet mass media apparatus was based on an elaborate system of centralization and control, through which Soviet political officials attempted to shape domestic public opinion. The degree to which they were successful is a matter of dispute and, as students of public opinion know, is a complicated issue. Second, leaders use various means for presenting their views abroad. Understanding the conditions under which public information successfully influences opinion is important to the study of foreign policy and alliance building. Finally, political change in the Soviet Union was fostered by Gorbachev's policy of glasnost, which abrogated the one-party line of the mass media. That said, the old institutional structures of the media did not disappear entirely with the new political context and changes in political norms. One of the more interesting questions for political scientists studying media systems and change is how, exactly, old structures change when confronted with new political ideas. So, while this book may be less than satisfying, it raises important issues for future study.

Cuba's Foreign Relations in a Post-Soviet World. By H. Michael Erisman. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2000. 336p. $49.95.

Cuba, the United States, and the Helms-Burton Doctrine: International Reactions. By Joaquín Roy. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2000. 281p. $55.00.

Joel C. Edelstein, University of Colorado at Denver

In Inevitable Revolutions: The United States in Central America (2nd edition, 1993), Walter LeFeber analyzes the extraordinary continuity of U.S. policy in Central America. Indeed, from the Rio Bravo all the way to Tierra del Fuego, for more than a century, the United States has refused to tolerate leftist governments when recourse to other options has been available. Thus even in 1959, it didn't take a political scientist to predict that the United States would not accept the Cuban revolution.

These monographs by Joaquín Roy and by Michael Erisman complement each other to provide a comprehensive view of Cuba's international relations. Roy's study, limited to the decade of the 1990s, sets out to analyze and explain the Helms–Burton law (HB), passed in 1996, in relation to U.S. domestic politics, the U.S.–Cuba relationship, and the wider international picture. "The global dimension is my principal focus, deriving from the internationalization of the original feud between Havana and Washington" (xvi).

Roy utilizes an admirably broad range of sources in his analysis of the interaction of the United States with the EU and its NAFTA partners in response to HB. His study is a valuable contribution to our understanding of, in Roy's words, "... how unilateral sanctions applied by one country (that is, the United States) can ripple beyond their main target (Cuba) to generate serious complications in its international relations" (p. xvi).

HB codified the U.S. economic embargo of Cuba, which had been maintained by executive order since 1962. A change in this policy would henceforth require positive Congressional action. HB brought near-universal condemnation from other countries because of a provision of the law allowing U.S. citizens to sue foreign nationals in U.S. courts for dealing with properties that Cuba had allegedly confiscated improperly in the early 1960s. Controversial within United States was a provision of the law that included in the definition of U.S. citizens those, almost exclusively Cuban-Americans, who had become citizens after the expropriation of their property in Cuba.

HB has failed to bring down the Cuban government by discouraging nationals of other countries from investing in Cuba. Its most important provision, Title III, which asserts extraterritoriality, has not been put into effect because of determined resistance from the EU, Canada, and Mexico.

When, in response to HB, the EU threatened to take the United States to the WTO, the Clinton administration agreed not to enforce Title III. This was in contrast to the conflict over Central and American and Caribbean bananas controlled by U.S. growers. Roy explains, "... Cuba is less important for the United States and the Euopean Union than the banana market—they risked confrontation at the WTO over this agricultural marketing disagreement, but they avoided a clash in the same place because of Cuba" (p. 179).

The Cuban economy has certainly been hurt by the embargo and sources in Cuba acknowledge that some foreign investors have been scared off. However, since the passage of HB, foreign investment in Cuba has increased and Cuba's economic recovery has continued. Nonetheless, Roy sees HB sees as quite significant, asserting that "... the law is more than a policy—it is an amorphous (although historically coherent) tool for updating the Monroe Doctrine. It is the Helms-Burton Doctrine" (p. xiv; original italics). He cites Jorge Domínguez: "The Helms-Burton Act is quite faithful to themes of the Monroe Doctrine and the Roosevelt Corollary .... [It] rediscovers the ideological brio of imperialism. At the end of the 20th century, as in centuries past, the United States is demanding the right to set the framework for the political and economic system it would tolerate inside Cuba" (p. 6).

Roy's analysis considers strategic, institutional, political, and legal aspects of U.S. policy toward Cuba. He notes that the goals of HB reflect the growing influence of Cuban exiles in the United States. Accordingly, he cites Samuel Huntington's statement that "the institutions and capabilities created to serve a grand national purpose in the Cold War are now being subordinated and redirected to serve narrow subnational, transnational, and even nonnational purposes." Huntington warns that American foreign policy is becoming a policy of "particularism increasingly devoted to the promotion abroad of highly specific commercial and ethnic interests" (p. 7). Roy goes on to note that foreign critics suggest that, contrary to Huntington's thesis of an idiosyncratic foreign policy, HP may reflect a U.S. will and strategy to control the future restructuring of global trade and investment.

Cuban foreign policy is not a focus in Roy's work and there is little substance in his comments that do address this subject. Erisman focuses on Cuba's foreign relations over four decades. In the course of his study he offers a valuable analysis of Cuban foreign policy, including Cuba's relations with the Soviet bloc and with nonaligned countries.

Erisman asserts that counterdependency has been the core organizing principle of Cuban foreign policy. He defines this policy agenda as one "... in which the government assigns top priority to cultivating the capacity to prevent exogenous penetration of its decision-making processes and thereby reduce its vulnerability to external power centers to the point where its sociopolitical and developmental dynamics are not basically the product of a subordinate relationship with a stronger industrialized country, but rather are a reflection of a series of formally or informally negotiated relationships on both horizontal (South-South) and vertical (North-South) axes" (p. 42; original italics). Erisman proposes a two-stage model of counterdependency politics in which the initial step is enlarging political/economic space by geographic and geopolitical diversification of trading partners. Diversification establishes a set of preconditions that place a developing country in an optimal position to proceed to "the second and more crucial phase of the counterdependency agenda—the acquisition and especially the assertive use of collective bargaining power" (p. 45).

In the 1960s, Cuba sought protection from a hostile United States by engaging with the Soviet Union and by encouraging revolutionary movements, especially in Latin America. It was hoped that creating "many Vietnams" would diffuse the focus of U.S. hostility, help Cuba to break out of isolation in the Americas, and reduce dependency within the Soviet bloc by creating more Third World Marxian Socialist governments (p. 74). The effort failed to produce additional revolutionary governments. Moreover, it was a source of stress in Cuba's relationship with the USSR, which opposed actions it regarded as adventurist with respect to the United States.

Cuba was much more successful in harmonizing foreign policy goals in the 1970s and 1980s, through a strategy that Erisman characterizes as "Cold War dual tracking" (p. 79). Cuba gained substantial economic resources as well as large infusions of military aid from the industrialized socialist bloc, enabling an increase in its influence vis-à-vis the Third World. Cuba's leadership of the nonaligned movement, and its international prestige in general, served to make it more valuavle to the Soviet Union and thus deserving of additional resources, while protecting Cuba to some degree from the United States. Erisman points out an unusual instance in which the two tracks were not synergistic, when Cuba's support of the Soviet Union's actions in Afghanistan carried great political costs in relations with the nonaligned movement. The crisis of the Soviet bloc reduced and then eliminated what had been a source of valuable resources and ended the two-track policy.

The revolutionary government initially sought to end dependence by plowing under sugar, following a debt-financed import substitution industrialization strategy. When debt mounted too fast, the road to independence seemed to go though an extreme focus on sugar to create a source of foreign exchange to finance industrialization. This strategy failed in 1970, leaving Cuba more dependent on the USSR.

In the early 1980s, based on its successes in medical care, Cuba began to develop a biotechnology industry in the hope that it could lead and finance a new, diversified economy. Progress has been made, but not nearly enough to avoid the disaster brought on by the demise of the socialist bloc. Erisman observes that "... Cuba's economic health, like that of practically any small island society, is heavily dependent on foreign trade .... By the early 1980s, ... Cuba had become extremely dependent on its CMEA connection .... Putting practically all one's economic eggs in a single basket is an extremely risky proposition, as would become painfully evident in the late 1980s and early 1990s" (p. 108).

Economic decline brought discontent, and according to Erisman, "Remarkably, despite all this adversity, Cuba continued its tradition of following the road less traveled, stubbornly maintaining its basic commitment to Fidelista socialism and refusing to compromise its nationalistic principals in any way in order to curry favor with the United States. Such defiance would not come cheaply, but as always Havana was willing to pay the price" (p. 107). Certainly, the options available to Cuba in this situation have been quite limited. I would suggest that Erisman has understated the amount of compromise that Cuba has accepted. For example, significantly greater inequality has resulted from an unavoidably dollarized economy, and this constitutes a real threat to the Fidelista vision of socialism.

Erisman's elucidation of the counterdependency strategy is a valuable contribution to our understanding of Cuban foreign policy. The conceptualization might be still more useful if it included the problematic role of the domestic economy. Without Soviet support and facing stronger U.S. efforts to isolate the island in the '90s, Cuba has welcomed foreign investment to survive. This could turn out to undermine the counterdependency strategy, if this new foreign sector outpaces the domestic sector of the economy and, thereby, becomes capable of commanding the Cuban state (and party) to favor its interests when conflicts arise between foreign enterprises and the Cuban people.

Rights Beyond Borders: The Global Community and the Struggle over Human Rights in China. By Rosemary Foot. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000. 308p. $65.00 cloth, $19.95 paper.

Human Rights in Chinese Foreign Relations: Defining and Defending National Interests. By Ming Wan. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001. 192p. $39.95.

Samuel S. Kim, Columbia University

Human rights as a focus of both theoretical and practical concern came alive in the last decade of the twentieth century. The end of the Cold War, the collapse of the Soviet Union, the "third wave" of democratization, and the globalization-cumtransparency revolution have all played a part in the widening and deepening of global human rights norms. The revitalization of human rights norms has profound implications for the complex interdependence between China and the global community. Indeed, human rights diplomacy is one of the most novel but generally overlooked aspects of international relations in post-Mao China, where it has finally come of age, whatever the motivation.

Sino-global interaction in the domain of human rights remains, however, one of the most perplexing and least studied questions in post-Cold- War global politics. It is a puzzle of both theoretical and practical significance that challenges scholars and policymakers concerned about the shape of postinternational life in the future. China's human rights diplomacy has not received the scholarly attention it deserves: Ann Kent's (1999) China, the United Nations, and Human Rights: The Limits of Compliance is the most conspicuous exception. Rosemary Foot's Rights Beyond Borders: The Global Community and the Struggle over Human Rights in China and Ming Wan's Human Rights in Chinese Foreign Relations: Defining and Defending National Interests go a long way toward filling the lacunae in the literature on this important but neglected subject, and they are welcome additions.

While both address China's theory and practice in human rights and the nature and impact of external pressure on China from key international actors, these two books proceed from different levels of analysis. Rosemary Foot-one of the leading British authorities on East Asian international relations—takes up China as a case study of global human rights politics in this latest work. The main focus is on global actions in response to China's practices in human rights rather than on China's reactions to external pressure. In contrast, Ming Wan examines China's human rights diplomacy as a case study of its foreign relations with four select groups of international actors—the United States, Western Europe, Japan, and the United Nations.

The major premise of Foot's book is that the issue of human rights has become an integral part of global politics, particularly so in the case of the global community's relationship with China. Drawing theoretical insights from international law and international relations literature, Foot provides an excellent and generally reliable analysis of the this complex and evolving relationship and considers, in particular, how normative concerns about the conditions of human rights in China have influenced the behavior of key international actors (e.g., selected nongovernmental organizations [NGOs], some national governments, and the human rights institutions of the United Nations) in the period since the Tiananmen carnage of June 1989. She adopts a chronological narrative approach to examine how seemingly powerless human rights norms—norms not backed by real enforcement mechanisms—have the power in a state like China to change external behavior and, to some extent, even internal behavior. China's reactive behavior, internal and external, to its role as the focus of so much global attention in this area is meticulously delineated and analyzed.

According to Foot, China's human rights behavior presents a kind of double or mutual challenge of legitimation. On the one hand, because of China's economic, strategic, and demographic weight in world politics, its compliance and cooperative participation are important to the credibility, viability, and legitimacy of the global human rights regime as a universal promoter of human rights. On the other hand, adherence to human rights norms has come to be associated with a state's political legitimacy in the post-Cold War era. China's willed national identity as a "responsible great power" is linked—by those acting as gatekeepers for entry into the exclusive great-power club—with compliance with these human rights norms.

Foot's principal argument is that China has been nudged along a meandering path that has led to a slow but steady involvement in the global human rights regime, consequently locking the Chinese government into discursive human rights formulations, not irrevocably but to a degree sufficient to demonstrate that China remains an integral part of the global human rights solution. What accounts for such forward movement in China's norm diffusion and enmeshment? Here Foot offers a rather long list of external and internal factors: U.S. power; the activities of United Nations (UN) human rights institutions; NGO pressure; the new criteria for membership in international society; the new processes of persuasion, argument, and shaming; and Beijing's great-power status drive, its concerns about its international image, and its understanding that the basis of legitimation has changed.

Despite such forward moves, Foot cautions, China's human rights norms have not progressed far enough for domestic internalization or implementation. Even at the level of policy discourse there are wild swings in Chinese human rights rhetoric, ranging from references that emphasize the universality and individuality of all rights to statements that stress cultural and developmental relativism. Foot cites several major sources of instability in policy pronouncements, of ambiguities in revised or new domestic legislation, and, especially, of the failure to follow through to full implementation: the structural statist underpinnings of the international human rights regime, the competing or conflicting interests of participating states within it, China's strategic and economic weight in world politics, and domestic factors associated with the maintenance of party and state control. Foot concludes, however, that the transformation of China's normative discourse, its deepening enmeshment in the global human rights regime, and domestic policy reform in the fields of criminal and other related legislation do indeed represent significant steps toward full acceptance of international human rights

Wan examines the role of human rights in China's relations with the United States, Western Europe, Japan, and the UN human rights regime, focusing on both the nature and the impact of the external pressure on China from these key international actors and on the tactics Beijing has adopted in response to such external pressure. Wan's main argument is simple and strictly realist: Although the issue of human rights is important in Western policy toward China, it has seldom prevailed over traditional economic and security interests, and Beijing, after a decade of external pressure, still treats human rights diplomacy as an integral part of traditional power politics. Further, China's dialogues with international actors on the subject of human rights have brought about only adaptive learning about how best to obviate Western pressure, rather than cognitive or normative learning about the importance of human rights per se. The different degrees of commitment to human rights and the respective importance of human rights norms relative to economic and strategic interests explain why Japan, Western Europe, and the United States, in that order, have gradually retreated from a confrontation with China on issues of human rights. Washington's high-pressure approach has become increasingly ineffective, with the exception of winning the release of high-profile intellectual dissidents. Beijing has also successfully neutralized Western European criticism, effectively sidelining human rights issues in Sino-European relations. Except for a brief period after Tiananmen (1989-90), the human rights debate has remained a nonissue in Sino-Japanese relations. Given Japan's imperial-era atrocities such as the rape of Nanking and biological-weapons experiments in Northeast China, China holds a trump card of another kind in its relations with Japan.

The most telling argument in Wan's book is that the UN human rights regime has played a useful mitigating role in Sino-Western relations in the domain of human rights. For the West, the UN human rights regime offers a more legitimate and less costly alternative to bilateral clashes. For China, the human rights regime offers a more congenial arena to seek and mobilize support of Third World member states to demonstrate that China is not really isolated in the international community on the issue of human rights. Wan also argues and concludes that "by successfully resisting external rights pressure, powerful target nations like China weaken the importance of human rights in the foreign policy deliberations of the Western countries that initiate pressure" (p. 143). The most interesting and illuminating part of the book is a background brief on Chinese views of human rights (chapter 2). Drawing from public opinion surveys, field interviews, and a wide range of Chinese-language sources, Wan defines the primary parameters for the possible and the permissible in relation to Chinese theory and practice in human rights: (1) That although views among government officials and social groups are becoming increasingly diverse, there is nonetheless a broad consensus on "developmental authoritarianism" (2) that the party-state is widely considered a necessary evil for the achievement of economic growth and well-being; and (3) that given the considerable public support in China for stability, any interventionist human rights diplomacy is both unwise and counterproductive.

Although these two books make significant contributions to the understanding of the complex and shifting relationship between China and the outside world, through excellent country-specific and issue-specific descriptive analyses, the shortcomings of both volumes stem from the lack of sustained theoretical rigor and some empirical/analytical omissions. Wan makes it clear at the outset that his book "is not designed to test international relations theories" (p. 11), so there is no point in assessing his book in theoretical terms. Foot's book reveals a keen conceptual mind for defining the puzzle of norm diffusion and enmeshment, if not that of norm internalization, an admirable command over international law and international relations literature, and an accessible and elegant prose. But she seems of more than two theoretical minds. As with her previous work—The Practice of Power: U.S. Relations with China Since 1949 (1995)—she seeks to supplement, not reject, realism "by paying attention to both the power and the symbolic elements in [her] explanation of behavior and discourse" (p. 6). As earlier noted, however, she catalogues a long list of the seemingly causal independent variables without providing a priori an aggregate weighting formula or prioritization.

Both authors overdo statism by omitting any discussion of the NGO-led struggle to extend the rule of law to crimes of state, especially U.S. and Chinese reactions to the Khmer Rouge genocide from 1975 to 1979 and the most important law-making conference since Nuremberg—the UN Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of the International Criminal Court (ICC), held in Rome from June 15 to July 17, 1998. In the Khmer Rouge case, the United States and China embraced a realpolitik partnership of the worst kind, giving strong diplomatic and indirect economic and military support to the Khmer Rouge and opposing the Vietnamese invasion that toppled the genocidal regime and ended the genocide in Cambodia (Kampuchea). In the UN Rome Conference, Chinese and American statismcum-unilateralism intersected once again when China, along with five rouge states including Iran and Libya, opposed the establishment of the ICC. The NGO-led global campaign to establish a permanent ICC eventuated in a treaty signed by 120 states in a vote of 120 to 7, despite the strong objections made by powerhouses like the United States and China. In several respects, the Rome treaty is ready-made for testing the outer possibilities and limitations of Sinoglobal interaction on human rights issues. Hence, by ignoring Chinese empirical and behavioral referents in the making of the ICC, both authors leave a gaping hole in their books.

Finally, neither volume pays any attention to the impact of globalization on the global human rights regime, on China's norm diffusion, enmeshment, and internalization, or on the "Asian values" debate. This omission stands out as another weakness, since the forces of globalization in the 1990s have transformed both the context and the conditions under which Sino-global interaction can be played out. There are today some 22.5 million Chinese with on-line access, and it is projected that by 2005 some 200 million will be Internet users. China must worry not only about military power but also about the economic power, cultural power, and knowledge power needed to survive and prosper in a world that is becoming increasingly globalized and competitive.

Protracted Contest: Sino-Indian Rivalry in the Twentieth Century. By John W. Garver. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 2001. 447p. $50.00.

Mark W. Frazier, University of Louisville

India's nuclear tests in May 1998 came as a surprise to many observers and proved all the more puzzling when Indian Prime Minister A. B. Vajpayee, in a letter to President Clinton, singled out China as the focal point of Indian security concerns. This statement and others led some, including Beijing's own foreign policy community, to view the tests as an effort to boost India's status internationally and to shore up domestic support for a new coalition government. John Garver's book challenges this domestic-driven interpretation of the tests by chronicling in detail a half-century of contentious relations between the world's two most populous states. Seen in historical perspective, India's nuclear tests were another episode in what Garver terms a "protracted conflict" (p. 3) between Beijing and Delhi. (The milder-sounding "protracted contest" serves as the book's title, but "protracted conflict," a term Garver uses with some frequency, better captures the book's thesis.)

While Garver acknowledges that there have been cooperative dimensions in Sino-Indian relations, he argues that conflict has been the predominant theme. The book's chapters are organized around specific manifestations of this conflict over the status of Tibet, the still unresolved border dispute, the exercise of leadership among the developing world, the expansion of naval capabilities in the Indian Ocean, and the development of nuclear weapons. Individual chapters also cover various states in which Chinese and Indian interests have diverged considerably: Nepal, Sikkim, and Bhutan, Burma, and, most significantly, Pakistan (to which two chapters are devoted). While overt military conflict between China and India has occurred only once (in 1962), Garver argues that this is a relationship in which both sides have been absorbed by the possibility of one day having to use military force against one another (p. 4). Garver concludes his portrait of this understated yet substantially conflictual relationship with a chapter on how it might change in the future toward more cooperative directions.

Garver's presentation proceeds in a well-structured, straightforward manner that achieves the right balance of detail and thematic focus. He documents his case using ample Chinese and Indian sources, both secondary and primary. Garver also reminds us of the significance of terrain and topography in several chapters, putting proper emphasis on the "geo" in the term "geopolitical conflict" (p. 22). The well-balanced presentation of problem areas in Sino-Indian relations does come at a sacrifice to the sort of hypothesistesting that some readers are likely to desire, which would help isolate the causes of this longstanding rivalry and its apparent intractability. Is the "protracted contest/conflict" a straightforward case of two neighboring states invariably competing as they seek to expand their capabilities and influence? To what extent is this rivalry the product of broader systemic forces during and after the Cold War? For that matter, why did the end of the Cold War and the decline of the Soviet Union not ameliorate the Sino-Indian conflict or at least push it toward more cooperative directions (as some have in fact asserted)? Garver states at the outset that one might analyze Sino-Indian relations within the framework of the Soviet-American conflict, and from the perspective of domestic development goals and processes specific to each state. The approach he favors, as he explains it, is to center his analysis on the "geopolitical conflict in the arc of land and waters lying between and alongside China and India" and to address these other factors "only to the extent that they impinge on their geopolitical rivalry" (p. 5).

With that said, readers must draw their own conclusions as to what is driving this pattern of conflict and competition between India and China. Garver does offer, in the introductory chapter, two explicit and rather intriguing "taproots" of the conflict. One is the fact that China and India have strong "nationalist narratives," in which their respective civilizations are seen as having extended a political, social, and economic influence well beyond their current borders as contemporary states. A map on page 15 shows the substantial overlap in the historic domains of Chinese and Indian influence (an overlap that includes Tibet, Nepal, Bhutan, and peninsular Southeast Asia). How such "nationalist narratives" work to shape modern foreign policy and the articulation of national interests is an intriguing question that deserves more sustained treatment than it gets in subsequent chapters. The second source of the Sino-Indian rivalry Garver identifies will likely prove more satisfactory to security specialists. He says that a security dilemma has arisen from India's need to exercise a kind of unstated "Monroe doctrine" in South Asia in which it exerts sole influence over states in the region. China, on the other hand, attaches great importance and derives its security from establishing cooperative links with its neighbors, including those in South Asia. As China seeks to enhance its security by developing such ties, it actually worsens the situation by undermining India's security.

Garver's conclusion that the relationship remains basically conflictual in the post-Cold War era is an important challenge to a prevailing view among specialists that Sino-Indian relations improved substantially after China allegedly acknowledged an Indian sphere of influence in South Asia in the late 1980s and early 1990s. Garver cautions us to distinguish between China's restraint in objecting to India's expanding power in South Asia versus an actual acceptance of Indian hegemony in the region. China has indeed refrained from providing overt support that India's neighbors have sometimes sought during various diplomatic and military confrontations with India, but China would not accept being shut out of the region, especially from its robust ties with Pakistan and Burma, Garver argues. The other dominant trend in the 1990s has been for India and China to attach added importance to fostering a security environment conducive to economic growth, expanded trade, and foreign investment. While such approaches might presage more cooperative relations, Garver suggests in his final chapter that the vast gaps in economic performance to date (with China far outpacing India) make it likely that any future cooperation between the two states will be highly asymmetric—and that, based on current trends. India might one day have little alternative to acknowledging China's preeminence in the South Asian region.

The sustained economic performance of India and China, and their expanding diplomatic and military clout, has prompted some scholars and policymakers to rethink the traditional boundaries that have long demarcated "East Asia" from "South Asia" and their respective communities of specialists. Garver's timely contribution to the understudied relationship between China and India will likely serve as a milestone in such efforts, and specialists on both sides of the Himalayan divide will benefit greatly from this book.

The Palestinian-Arab Minority in Israel, 1948-2000: A Political Study. By As'ad Ghanem. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2001. 238p. $62.50 cloth, $20.95 paper.

Alan Dowty, University of Notre Dame

This study, a volume in the SUNY Israel Studies series, represents a new stage of maturity in academic research on Israel's Arab minority: a serious and scholarly (if rather severe) overview from within that community. Ghanem, a lecturer at Israel's University of Haifa, has, within a few short years, emerged as a leading academic analyst of Israeli Arab political issues, and the book at hand will cement his reputation. It combines an insider's feel for his subject with a critical, but reasonably restrained and balanced, presentation of a topic that has too often generated apologetics or polemics. Ghanem does not focus on the history or substance of relations between the Jewish majority and Arab citizens of Israel, or on official policies and practices. On these issues he briefly redraws the picture sketched by previous studies, most of them by Israeli Jewish scholars: Israeli Arabs/Palestinians (the latter designation is increasingly preferred) have formal rights of citizenship, but are in fact second-class citizens both in law (given legal expressions of the Jewishness of the state) and, even more, in practice. While they have made great absolute progress by most measures in the half-century of Israeli statehood, a huge gap between the two communities remains. Furthermore, they are doubly marginalized, first, as Israelis and, second, as part of the broader Palestinian Arab community in which their position is also problematic.

The main thrust of Ghanem's book, however, is a systematic analysis of the various political "streams" (camps or movements) among Israeli Palestinians. Ghanem faults Israeli Jewish scholars for classifying these groups by the self-centered criterion of their attitudes toward Israel and, quite reasonably, posits instead a set of more objective criteria. As it turns out, the resulting categories do not actually differ greatly from previous ones. Ghanem identifies an Israeli–Arab stream (those groups working within the system), the Communists (for a long time the major established party giving full expression to Arab demands), the nationalists (divided between the pan-Arabists and those with a Palestinian focus), and the Islamists (more moderate than their counterparts elsewhere).

Ghanem's clear explication of the thinking of these "streams" makes this the book of choice for those interested in the political divisions among Arabs in Israel. His account confirms the widely noted growth of a Palestinian identity in this community and adds many other observations worth noting. Ghanem notes, for example, that the chances of the Islamic Movement attracting new members "are rather slim, given the wave of modernization and secularization among the Arabs in Israel" (p. 125). He calls attention to the resurgence of clan-based politics at the local level, presenting it as an alternative (and decidedly retrograde) political grouping. Another observation of special interest is the remarkable growth of civil society; according to Ghanem's own research, there were 180 public societies among Israeli Arabs in 1990 but another 656 were added in the next nine years.

Could the grievances of the Israeli Arab minority be corrected within the existing system—or would it require a basic redefinition of the Jewish state (that is, "deJudaizing" or "deZionizing" Israel)? This is the defining issue in the political divisions among Palestinians in Israel, but it is also a question that calls for more extensive scholarly comparisons to experiences of minorities in other democratic states. It would be very useful, in particular, to compare the situation of Israeli Palestinian Arabs to that of other embattled minorities in conflict, rather than trying to set standards and expectations in a vacuum. This is not to single out the book at hand for special criticism, as there are lamentably few comparative perspectives generally in studies of Israel, on this issue or on others.

Ghanem does make brief references to the consociational power-sharing models of Belgium and Switzerland in the framework of making a case for the explicit recognition of a group identity for Israeli Arabs. He argues, very persuasively in this reviewer's judgment, that the liberal model with no mediation between individual and state will not work in the ethnically charged environment of the Arab–Israel conflict. On the other hand, group bargaining and power-sharing between Jews and Arabs enjoys the overwhelming support of Israel Arabs (p. 182).

Ghanem pursues this approach, however, with a twist that gives it an entirely new significance. In a final chapter that is certain to provoke much debate, he urges consociationalism not in the framework of current Israeli borders but in the former Palestine mandate as a whole, that is, including the West Bank and Gaza strip, the occupied territories, which are not a focus in earlier chapters. Thus, rather than consociational accommodation of a minority, he shifts to a binational version in which Jews and unified Palestinian Arabs stand in rough numerical, legal, and political parity. This reflects a revival of interest in a binational state solution among Palestinians in the occupied territories, arguing (as Ghanem does) that separation into two states is not workable because of Israeli unwillingness to grant true independence to the West Bank and Gaza or (Ghanem's focus) true equality to Arabs within Israel.

The separation implied in a two-state solution does indeed face many obstacles, including Jewish settlements in the territories, shared resources such as water, environmental issues, and economic interdependence. But skeptics will point out that the obstacles are not necessarily made easier to overcome by living together. The same problems of sharing water and distributing public goods would remain but would have to be dealt with on a continuing basis rather than in one decisive denouement. A binational state would be vastly more complicated, as Ghanem indicates when he notes that it would require substantial changes "in nature of relations between the two peoples . . . in the two entities, the Palestinian and the Israeli...[and] in the nature of the two national movements" (p. 198). Just to take one immediate problem that comes to mind: What would the immigration policy be? Would the binational state continue to welcome all Jews? Would it be open to the 3.8 million registered Palestinian refugees? The potential for a demographic war seems explosive. Perhaps, for all that, a difficult divorce is better than hostile cohabitation.

Tying their fate to that of the Palestinians in the territories is, of course, attractive to Palestinians in Israel because they would no longer be a minority. But this could also be accomplished in a two-state solution to the conflict, by allowing Israeli Arab areas to opt for incorporation into the Palestinian state. This may seem an extremely radical idea in the current context—but perhaps no more so than binationalism, which would require Israelis to give up the basic Zionist vision of a Jewish state. Ghanem has, however, posed exactly the right dilemma for the Jewish majority in Israel. Eventually they will have to choose: Will they give up territory, settlements and hegemony over Palestinians? or Will they give up the idea of a Jewish state? Data presented in the book (pp. 160-163) underline the basic attachment of Israelis to a Jewish state, providing grounds to argue that when the crunch comes, most will choose separation over binationalism. But however it falls, the necessity of choice has seldom been posed so compellingly.

After Victory: Institutions, Strategic Restraint, and the Rebuilding of Order After Major Wars. By G. John Ikenberry. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2000. 293p. $55.00 cloth, $19.95 paper.

K. J. Holsti, University of British Columbia

Forty years ago Arnold Wolfers lamented that scholars had failed to examine those rare occasions, following great wars, when statesmen gather to refashion the norms and institutions of international politics. He noted in his (1962) Discord and Collaboration (pp. 137–38) that creating a new order after the close of war is "one of the trickiest tasks of diplomacy," for how that order is fashioned will have a profound impact on the subsequent pattern of war. Charles Doran's (1971) The Politics of Assimilation, Robert Randle's (1973) The Origins of Peace, and my (1991) Peace and War: Armed Conflict and International Order provided empirical support for Wolfers' insights, but G. John Ikenberry offers the first study that links peacemaking to specific types of international order.

Since Vienna (1815), the leading victors have pursued increasingly expansive proposals to establish intergovernmental institutions that bind the great powers together and institutionalize their relations after the war. These order-building arrangements derive from a fundamental bargain between the leading postwar power and its allies. The leading state agrees to restrain its use of power. Others states in turn agree to join the winner's institutional arrangements that are designed to "lock in" its wartime gains.

Ikenberry hypothesizes that the greater the power disparities following major armed conflict, the greater the probability that the leading power will avoid abandonment or domination strategies and instead seek to create a legitimate, institutionalized order. The success of that effort also depends upon the character of the states partaking in the great bargain. Democracies can make commitments to restrain the use of power that can be trusted by others. Ikenberry argues, for example, that the Soviet Union accepted German reunification and the expansion of NATO between 1989 and 1991 because its policymakers had few fears of democracies and appreciated that major post-1945 institutional arrangements such as the UN, NATO, and WTO are essentially benign and nonthreatening. "Institutional logic" thus helps to explain not only how orders get created but why they endure.

Ikenberry's larger purpose is to explore the bases of political order in general. How to transform raw power into legitimate authority is the central theoretical question of the book. It is essentially a question of how to manage winning. He argues, challenging conventional ideas of international theory, that the international realm and domestic polities do not have two fundamentally different structures. International orders can take on "constitutional" characteristics by "limiting the returns to power" (p. 6). Just as elections and other constitutional devices guarantee that winners cannot rule by pure domination within states, international treaties and institutions can limit the power of war victors. Ikenberry suggests that the crucial distinction between domestic and international orders is not anarchy and hierarchy, but among three strategies for power management: domination (hegemony), balance of power, and the great bargain entailing a winner's self-limitation in exchange for general commitments to institutional arrangements.

Ikenberry embeds his analysis in the theoretical debate between realists who insist that order derives from power and those who argue that it is the result of institutions and ideas. He suggests that this is a false dichotomy. Power is an essential source of order, but international institutions inherently limit it. Liberal institutional theories have not explored the ways the leading state uses intergovernmental institutions to restrain itself and thereby dampen the fears of domination and abandonment by secondary states (p. 15).

The historical chapters explore the origins of the great settlements of 1815, 1919, and the more amorphous post-1945 arrangements. The discussion of wartime peace planning in each of the episodes is particularly rich. Ikenberry focuses on the elements of the "great bargain," how power disparities helped or hindered institutional arrangements, and how democracies were able to make commitments acceptable to the lesser states. The cases fit the model quite well. Post-1945 institutions have come closest to resembling a constitutional order. They have endured and expanded despite the collapse of polarity and the end of the Cold War. International institutions, Ikenberry (p. 273) concludes, "can make the exercise of power more restrained and routinized, but they can also make that power more durable, systematic, and legitimate."

The analysis addresses some key issues in realist, liberal, and constructivist approaches to international relations in general and international order specifically. Its innovative erasure of the distinction between anarchical and hierarchical orders merits serious consideration. The model, however, contains limitations. It is basically a power and rational choice device. Ikenberry discusses ideas and the role of leadership, but these are not linked specifically to the model. Ideas, in particular, have no independent influence. Nor does the model include the handling of the defeated powers after the great wars. Vienna succeeded and endured for almost 40 years in large part because the winners incorporated France into the peacemaking process. Paris in 1919 failed in part because the victors unilaterally imposed a punitive peace on Germany and in effect eliminated two important actors of the system. The fate of defeated powers is a major source of the durability of peace and the elements of international order. The model leaves no space for such normative dimensions of order-building. Justice as a foundation of international order receives no attention.

The focus on power and the logic of choice after major wars also precludes consideration of broader sources of international order. As Hedley Bull (Anarchical Society, 1977) and followers of the English school emphasize, international order derives from the interplay of interests, practices, ideas, and norms over long historical periods. Order is less the result of one power's policies than the habitualized practices of many powers. Bull and his followers speak of international order; Ikenberry addresses the question of the order.

The erasure of the line between domestic and international orders also raises issues. International orders, in Ikenberry's sense, are created and sustained by negotiated deals between the leading states. This is a realm of power, influence, commitments, and trust. The domestic realm, in contrast, is one of authority—a consensual right to rule and the corollary obligation to obey. Except for WTO decisions and some policies in the European Union, no party in international relations wields authority. Ikenberry duplicates the common error of conflating power and authority. Finally, Ikenberry speaks repeatedly of the "leading state" that formulates the essential bargain. But in 1815 and, to a lesser extent, in 1919, it is not clear that there was a single leading state. Russian troops patrolled Paris streets, while the diplomats bargained in Vienna. Many Europeans were more concerned with Russian than British domination. Ikenberry gives short shrift to the role of Russia and Austria (particularly Metternich) in the formation of the post-Napoleonic order. Similarly, while Wilson played a key role in the formation of post-1919 institutions, the Versailles treaty reflected French and British, more than American, paramountcy. The historical evidence does not always match the model's crude representation of Ikenberry's volume nevertheless presents a persuasive explanation for the formation and endurance of specific international orders and explores some questions not sufficiently addressed by Bull and his successors. It also does much more. It provides interesting historical evidence. It couples the problem of international order to questions of political order in general. It raises issues of contemporary American foreign policy. What will be the consequences of the Bush administration's proclivity to threaten, rescind, abandon, and scorn major order-creating international agreements? Are the looming abrogation of the ABM treaty and the militarization of space consistent with the idea of the self-limiting leading state? And the study offers major challenges to contemporary approaches to international theory. It is an exemplary positivist theoretical effort and rightfully can claim to be one of the major contributions to international relations in the past decade.

African Foreign Policies: Power and Process. Edited by Gilbert M. Khadiagala and Terrence Lyons. Boulder: Lynne Rienner, 2001. 260p. $55.00 cloth, $19.95 paper.

Timothy M. Shaw, University of London

The analysis and practice of foreign policy are in flux on the African continent as elsewhere at the turn of the century.

The combined forces of the end of bipolarity, then apartheid plus exponetial liberalization(s) and globalization(s), have changed the balance of power, not just between states externally but also between states and nonstate actors (e.g., civil societies and private sectors) internally. The eight regional or national case studies in this collection capture the latter dynamic well-foreign policy is no longer, if it ever was, the monopoly of regimes—but the pair of end pieces by the coeditors is, alas, more cautious and realistic. Thus, this original volume, by nine mainly younger scholars, encapsulates the debate about the sources and causes of, actors and interests in, inter- and transnational relations in this distinctive region with relevance for broader discourses about local to global governance. So chapters 1 and 10 could have been written a decade ago, whereas the central eight very much reflect the profound changes in relations and analyses of the 1990s, especially that by William Reno, "External Relations of Weak States and Stateless Regions in Africa," with resonance for comparable regions such as Central Europe and Central Asia.

Nevertheless, if, like Reno, you are interested not only in weak states but in the real political economy of transitional countries, then you would want mention of a range of current issues affecting human development/security such as AIDS/HIV, biodiversity, blood diamonds, drought/floods, drugs/guns, illegal/informal sectors, mafias/militias, and new technologies. Alas, on such contemporary issues, except for Reno's contribution, this volume is largely silent. Nevertheless, Peter Schraeder does note the growing role of diasporas in Northern host's foreign policies (p. 53).

The dramatic shift in perspective or paradigm from old to new framework is apparent in chapter 2 from a hitherto determined realist, Clement Abide, who now asserts that "the foreign policy context of Anglophone West Africa in the past decade has assaulted the state-centric model of classical international politics" (p. 27), leading to "the proliferation of actors and issues," which compels a "redefinition of interests and alliance...consistent with the globalizing tendencies of late-twentieth century neoliberalism" (p. 17). Rene Lemarchand offers an equally revisionist account of "a power shift of seismic proportions throughout the central African Great Lakes Region" (p. 87), suggesting that the fleeting new regional alliance reflected certain historical ethnicitiesa latter-day "Hima empire"?—though he comes to overplay the Rwanda card, asserting that in the 1990s, it emerged "as something of a regional hegemon" (p. 92). In contrast, from a more metropolitan viewpoint, Peter Schraeder indicates that Parisian policymakers worried that the coming to power of Paul Kagame represented the rise of Anglo-Saxon influence in Central Africa. But the most compelling and challenging (for a variety of assumptions and approaches) of the chapters is the more comparative one by Reno, who turns state-centrism on its head.

In developing his increasingly powerful and popular redefinition of the character and interests of the actors involved in African conflicts, Reno asserts that "regimes that preside over the disintegration of formal state institutions use private actors to conduct interstate diplomacy and to garner external resources to ensure regime survival" (p. 185). He highlights how the "private diplomacy" of mining companies can serve failing regimes so that both weak and strong states may have mutual interests: "Private global actors are indeed central to the survival of Africa's system of states and the regimes that rule these states" (p. 186). In contrast, while dealing with much of the same terrain as Reno, John F. Clark argues that "foreign policy in central Africa is marked more by continuity than change" (p. 67). And both he and Ruth Iyob indicate how, in terms of both actors and relations, the definition of regions on the continent is fluid, with conflicts in, say, the Great Lakes and Horn, and central and southern Africa, impacting on each other over time (p. 82).

Several contributions also present an interesting set of comments about nonstate actors, primarily NGOs, derived from different regions; regrettably, companies, unions, even media hardly appear here. Khadiagala treats NGOs appropriately: They "have emerged on the margins of Southern African Development Community (SADC) as alternative purveyors of norms and policies that have a regional reach" (p. 150). In contrast, Adibe cautions that "the unregulated operation of diverse NGOs and transnational organizations is worrisome in West African diplomacy and nation-building processes" (p. 35).

Coeditor Gilbert Khadiagala laments that SADC has lost direction postapartheid, indicating that now "the foreign policy choices of southern African states are constrained by weak state structures, economic despair, and social dislocations" (p. 131). He outlines interregime disagreements over treaties about free trade, security, etc., in the region while noting the resilience of nonstate actors such as NGOs, think tanks, and trade unions: "Weak states furnish fragile bases for regionalism .... SADC is incapable of meeting problems of internal implosion and civil wars, and its role in building values and norms has been equally problematic" (p. 149).

Reinforcing attention to the southern subcontinent, Denis Venter offers the only case study of a single country rather than a region: the regional center of South Africa, which, postapartheid, is "clearly suffering an identity crisis in its external relations" (p. 177). Change for it is compounded by the combination of democratization and globalization along with unrealistic expectations at home and abroad, especially in the region. Venter points to the broad range of state and nonstate actors in its foreign policy nexus, cautioning about the danger of NGO cooptation through consultation, though he favors more open and representative decision making. The Mbeki regime has attempted to balance interests and resources by articulating a range of ambitions around the notion of an "African renaissance" (p. 170).

In short, if you want more critical approaches see Peter Vale, Larry A. Swatuk, and Bertil Oden (eds.) Theory, Change & Southern Africa's Future (2001), and if you want more comparative perspectives see Philip Nel and Patrick J. McGown (eds.) Power, Wealth and Global Order: An International Relations Textbook for Africa (revised second edition, 1999), even if both of these concentrate on southern Africa. As the coeditors belatedly recognize in their final paragraph, "With the multiplicity of actors, amorphous targets, and uncertain outcomes, African foreign policy has entered uncharted territory" (p. 21).

Migrants and Citizens: Demographic Change in the European State System. By Rey Koslowski. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 2000. 232p. $39.95.

Patrick Ireland, Georgia Institute of Technology

Every scholar likes to think that what he or she studies is of capital importance. For that reason alone, this ambitious book would have to please immigration specialists. "Demography is destiny" is Rey Koslowski's thesis, boiled down, and in his view it is almost impossible to overrate migration's impact on international politics. While guilty of overreaching in a few spots and failing to appreciate the role of politics in quite a few more, he makes a compelling case overall. His bold work both brings a stimulating perspective to a multidisciplinary area of study that is still seeking its center of gravity and serves to remind the field of international relations (IR) that migration deserves its full attention.

The author has a two-pronged objective. At the theoretical level he hopes to advance understanding of contemporary global politics. Advanced through the "thought experiments," secondary data analysis, and historical evidence characteristic of the IR field, his argument poses a challenge to prevailing international relations and democratic theories. Throwing into doubt the notion of nation-state sovereignty, migration belies the assumption current in much of the literature on democracy of a bounded collection of citizens comprising the demos. Nor does it fit the dichotomy between domestic hierarchy and international anarchy that underpins realism or always act as a force for international cooperation as neoliberalism holds. Koslowski sees the nation-state as a transitory, atypical social construct, forged within a unique set of demographic circumstances. Since 1945, changes in that context have transformed domestic politics and, in turn, the international system.

Mass migration has most clearly begun to flush out the problems latent in modern national political institutions in Europe, and at a more substantive level the author's goal is to retell the European migration story. The book takes an expansive historical sweep, which should be eye-opening to social scientists not well versed in migratory movements within and to the continent before the Second World War. In fact, it is easy for anyone caught up in trying to understand contemporary immigration to forget the essentially nomadic nature of human existence (chapter 3) and the historical sources of the distinctions between nationality and citizenship (chapter 4). There are a couple of surprising omissions in the literature reviewed—Lars Olsson's work on immigration as a cause of World War I, for instance, would only bolster the author's argument—and few revolutionary insights are offered. Nevertheless, the material is packaged and pointed in a novel way that promises to stir useful discussion among immigra-

The central thesis, certainly, will fuel debate: Long marked by polyethnicity, Europe constructed nation-states in response to unprecedented population growth and emigration in the midnineteenth century. Recent demographic changes have heralded a shift back to polyethnicity and have thus created a "mismatch" between resident populations and political institutions (p. 8). The presence of durable immigrantorigin communities, the emergence of an EU labor mobility regime, the negative effects of unilateral national actions, the (domestically driven) proliferation of individual rights and their acquisition by noncitizens (most notable in the spread of dual nationality)—the challenges to nation-state sovereignty in Europe have been relentless. They have also tended to act at cross-purposes, as migration has stirred up a titanic clash among democracy, citizenship based on bloodline (jus sanguinis), and federalism (pp. 133-34). In this light European Citizenship signals a toleration of complexity that might result in new institutional setups. They would mean no less than a reconfiguration of democracy and the international system.

A robust contention, to say the least. In fact, the author's mission to put forward demography as an all-purpose explanation occasionally takes him too far. Neoliberal institutionalism may well err in relegating migration to the status of a garden-variety regime issue (p. 17); yet surely transportation, communications, capital flows, and the like have played a more considerable role in undermining nation-state sovereignty than this study would allow. Not surprisingly, there are several approving references to Hedley Bull's "new medievalism" idea. European authorities and loyalties do seem to have been returning to the functional differentiation of the past. Even as patterns of labor market segmentation by ethnic origin and gender emerge, however, capitalism itself has become more globally integrated. With the economists' push–pull model still at the heart of many immigration studies, it will be a tough sell to convince most specialists that no first-order relationship exists between the global economy and the multiple identities exhibited by immigrants.

Even more likely to raise eyebrows is the near-absence of domestic political struggle here. Demography pushes all before it, and the progression from polyethnicity to ethnically homogeneous societies (and nation-states) and then back to polyethnicity appears as natural as the swing of a pendulum or the ebb and flow of the tides. Whenever the causal link between population movements and actual policies is at issue, the vague, passive language of constructivism crops up. Thus, for example, we learn that our "thinking about politics" has been "reified in the reproduction of practices that make possible territory as an institution" (p. 23) and that the European migration regime has been "influenced by the agenda setting of dueling epistemic communities" (p. 161).

Similar caginess attends the discussion of citizenship laws. Thus as nation-states developed into "containers" for political institutions, they apparently had no choice regarding their nationality laws, as demography ruled out alternative outcomes (pp. 25-27). With politics bled out of the story, the truism that the distinction between jus sanguinis and jus soli would have no import in a world without migration becomes evidence of demography's explanatory force (p. 80). Part of the problem here may be an overreliance (on the European side) on scholarship from Germany, whose political class obsesses over formal citizenship and jus sanguinis. In that country alone, though, tens of thousands of resident noncitizens have not applied for naturalization, despite their eligibility and official efforts encouraging them to do so. Nor, as the author admits but underplays, have naturalization rates proved significantly higher where dual nationality is permitted (p. 190). In short, one should guard against assuming that "demographically determined" legal restrictions are the only impediments to inclusion.

"We easily forget that people make political institutions happen," the author rightly reminds us (p. 186). He himself tends to lose sight of the trees for the forest, however. Immigrants matter not merely because their collective presence sparks a spontaneous policy response. It would hardly detract from demography's causal power to stress its impact on the size, composition, and resources available to various groups, who then engage in a political battle over policy. The impressive array of rights enjoyed by resident noncitizens in Europe did not appear automatically. Trade unions, social movements, and immigrants themselves fought hard to win them. It is necessary to consider immigrant integration, which is an unavoidably political process involving far more than just citizenship laws and formal rights. The EC Commission recognized as much in its Communication on a Community Immigration Policy in November 2000. Even if demography loads the dice, the conflicts and small victories of daily coexistence on Europe's increasingly mean streets affect policy outcomes. Then neighborhood is the spatial site in which the contradictions so eloquently presented in this book are finding their resolution.

So, this book overshoots and lapses into demographic determinism at times. That said, perhaps such overkill is justifiable when trying to effect a correction in a field of political science that has for too long neglected the consequences of population movements. It is hard to read this book and not be convinced that Grotius has finally triumphed over Hobbes and that those of us who study immigration really are onto something. Maybe it is our destiny.

Being Useful: Policy Relevance and International Relations Theory. Edited by Miroslav Nincic and Joseph Lepgold. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2000. 416p. $80.00 cloth, $29.95 paper.

Mary Durfee, Michigan Technological University

Thucydides, one of the intellectual fathers of international relations (IR), wrote a postmortem of a great war. In the process he also served as a general and was banished from Athens when he arrived too late to save a battle. Fortunately for us, the banishment improved his data and his analysis. Such are the delicate complications of analysis, theory, and practice. Being in the world of action provides crucial questions; distancing oneself from that world provides insight into the questions. This volume edited by Miroslav Nincic and Joseph Lepgold explores the variety of problems and prospects associated with linking theory and practice in international affairs. They do not argue that theory should be rejected for praxis. Rather they and their contributors argue that the isolation of the two unnecessarily oversimplifies the political world. The world of academic IR theory can benefit from closer contact with the world of policy and the world of policy will do better if it uses more theory.

After a foreword by Alexander George, the collection begins with a chapter by Nincic that addresses whether contact with the policy world makes for bad science. While neither this chapter nor the entire book put together would convince those most dedicated to the proposition that science and relevance are antithetical, it does lay out a landscape of theory and practice with identifiable landmarks. As a result, those actually interested in engaging the issue will be able to navigate the issue more readily. The basic argument is developed by Arthur Stein, who makes the strongest case against policy relevance. He succeeds in showing, however, that if IR can help distinguish quackery from serious "medical" advice, both worlds will be better off. Lepgold refines the discussion further by suggesting a continuum from "pure" or general IR theory, to issue-oriented puzzles, to case-oriented scholarship, to policymaking. He notes that policymakers are unlikely to be able to use general theory directly (and vice versa) but that interactions between the parts of continuum can improve all the forms of scholarship as well as policymaking. Moreover, seen this way, the chasm between pure theory and policy is less daunting, because it can be bridged in stages.

Section two of the volume offers chapters by individuals who have been, as Bruce Jentleson puts it, "professors in government" and seen successes and failures in using IR theory in policy. Next, the book moves to chapters on how better characterization of the domestic setting can improve the understanding of foreign policy. As real decision makers look at both the domestic and the international scenes in making choices, this was a useful decision by the editors. The remaining two parts of the book take up specialized approaches to issues and the particular intersection of rational choice with policy relevance, respectively. Each chapter in the volume ends with notes and a strong bibliography, thus readily allowing for additional research into the issues presented in the chapter. There was a modest effort at indexing the book, but the index will prove less useful than the chapter endnotes and bibliographies.

The editors reiterate Alexander George's insight that policy-relevant theory is contingent proposition-based, which is another way of saying that it is process-oriented. Process shows up throughout the volume. Yet the editors make too little of that commonality in the volume. Policy-relevant theory is process theory first and causal theory second. This suggests that IR scholars with theoretical bents might do well to think about what movement in theory might look like and how best to model it. The need for process theory is presented most forcefully by Emily Goldman in her chapter on the diffusion of military technology and by Steven Brams and Jeffrey Togman in their application of the theory of moves. But it appears in the work of the professors in government (Jentleson and Ernest Wilson) and in Donald Rothschild's discussion of ethnic conflict as well, when they talk about linking knowledge and action and explicating consequences of different choices. Even the rational choice perspective of A. F. K. Organski, writing about the status of Jerusalem negotiations, presents the model over time.

More thought about process questions as they relate to the central problematic of political science—how insides and outsides of polities become linked—might have afforded a better home to the chapters on the domestic setting. As it is, the two chapters on the domestic setting, one by Robert Lieber, on the Madisonian features of the U.S. system, and the other by Eric Larson, exploring different theories of public opinion relative to Bosnia, are interesting on their own but seem out of place in the volume. It was also hard to know what to do with Donna Nincic's geopolitics chapter, in part because it does not apparently fit the general pattern of process theory.

General Patton once remarked that the perfect plan is the enemy of the merely good one in hand. Their next volume should pursue theories of process; in the meantime, Nincic and Lepgold have given us a good start for exploring the ties between IR theory and practice in our teaching and research. The diligent among us who hope to court the Prince will learn how to communicate better by considering the range of things policymakers want to know at different points in policymaking. For those of us devoted to life in the academy, the book clearly shows that theories connected to empirical referents will get better and better over time. Most important, the book reminds us that IR has room for all kinds of scholars and the variety of journals that goes with that diversity.

Extradition, Politics, and Human Rights. By Christopher H. Pyle. Philadelphia, PA: Temple University Press, 2001. 445p. $89.95 cloth, $29.95 paper.

Mark Gibney, University of North Carolina-Asheville

I approached this book with the dreaded sense that the subject matter of extradition would not hold my interest for very long, certainly not a hefty book of this size, and doubting the connection with human rights advertised in the title. I was decidedly wrong on both counts. Perhaps the first prejudice can be excused on the grounds that scholarship on this subject has indeed been "relentlessly academic," as Christopher Pyle himself acknowledges. This book, however, is anything but this. Instead, it not only has very impressive scholarship and is certainly pertinent to world events (especially after September 11), but also is a wonderful read.

With respect to human rights, Pyle immediately and convincingly shows the manner in which extradition is centered around issues of individual liberty, due process of law, and humanitarian concerns. In short, extradition is—or at least should be—all about human rights. Yet what Pyle catalogs in this historical account is the manner in which extradition principles have come to be degraded. In essence, we have moved away from justice all in the name of pursuing justice.

For the so-called "rusty" reader, extradition is the process by which one state surrenders to a requesting state persons accused (or convicted) of crimes against the laws of the requesting state for prosecution (or punishment). Extradition was viewed with a jaundiced eye by the new American republic for the simple reason that the world's first democracy felt a deep concern for returning even the most notorious criminals and political offenders to the unjust and undemocratic regimes of Europe. In addition to this, because of the British policy of impressing American seamen, there was a deep concern for protecting those who were taken to other lands against their will. And, finally, at the time of this country's founding, extradition was generally treated as a legal, not a political, process. And for this reason, extradition was naturally viewed as the preserve of judges and not political actors.

Given the obscurity to which nearly all extradition cases have now been relegated, it was surprising to learn that many of the earliest extradition cases, most notably those involving Thomas Nash, Jonathan Robbins, and the revolting slaves on the Amistad, captured both national and international attention. And what springs to life in these pages is the manner in which extradition brought together a veritable Who's Who of American statesmen—Washington, Jefferson, Adams, Lincoln, and Webster—with the not so famous, even the infamous. But the larger point is that, at one time in American history, extradition was taken very seriously. And the reason for this is that extradition represented certain American values.

Extradition still reflects American values, but these values are different from those that existed earlier in this country's history. One of the great ironies at work here is that those who have been so quick to invoke the founding fathers are invariably those who have done so much to corrupt the principle of extradition that the founders sought to establish. What we have at present is the business of extradition. And like its economic counterpart, the United States will do business with just about any state, which means that the U.S. government has willfully ignored the brutality and corrupt nature of any number of states in the name of pursuing "justice." The prime reason for this callousness is the hope that these states will reciprocate, as they have. But as Pyle so effectively documents, under such a system the rights of individuals have come to be completely submerged to larger political ends.

Another reason for this cavalier approach is that we assume that extradition only affects "others." However, anywhere between 10 and 20% of those extradited by the U.S. government are American citizens. And yet the manner in which we have treated our people (as well as "others") has at times been nothing less than criminal, best personified by the efforts of certain segments of the U.S. government (the Office of Special Investigation in the Department of Justice, in particular) essentially to frame John Demjanjuk as Ivan the Terrible. Given the failures of American justice, the only thing that saved Demjanjuk's life was a courageous Israeli Supreme Court that withstood tremendous public pressure and held that the extraordinarily weak (and incomplete) evidence that was relied upon to extradite Demjanjuk was really no evidence at all.

From the opposite end, the U.S. government has steadily expanded the extraterritorial reach of American law. What has not followed, however, is any of our constitutional protections. Because of this, the manner in which an individual has come into custody in a foreign land has been treated, somehow, as being irrelevant. This has led to all sorts of human rights abuses, including torture and kidnapping (by foreign and American officials alike), and yet our judiciary reasons that violations in other lands are different in kind from violations committed within the United States. And the business of extraditing and prosecuting continues apace.

Pyle presents a number of proposals for reforming extradition, and given the litany of abuses that he presents, one would be hard pressed to disagree with any one of these. All of these are premised on the idea that we are speaking of individuals who possess certain legal rights that need to be protected. One problem that Pyle glides over is that he wants to reestablish extradition as a legal process and to remove political considerations. Yet the judicial heroes whom he invokes are, for the most part, several centuries removed from the present, which is also to say that in matters of extradition the judicial branch has come to align itself solidly with the political branches. Pyle states at the outset that his focus will be squarely on United States law and not international law. However, what is one to do when there are so few (if any) checks and balances in the domestic realm? Given the fact that extradition is, by definition, justice beyond our national borders, perhaps it only makes sense to look to international solutions and mechanisms. This, however, is not the approach that Pyle would adopt.

Pyle's book is, at bottom, a plea to take extradition as seriously as it was taken at the time of the creation of the United States. This will not be easy, especially given the mood and the need for "justice" following the terrorist attacks on the United States on September 11. In fact, things are likely to get much worse before they ever become better. Yet if there is a book that will make us sit up and take notice of how lawless and inhumane our actions have been in this realm, it is this book.

Politics, Markets, and Grand Strategy: Foreign Economic Policies as Strategic Instruments. By Lars S. Skålnes. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2000. 272p. $54.50.

Brian M. Pollins, The Ohio State University

To date, the main body of research on the economic dimensions of foreign policy has focused on narrow, tactical considerations alone. Are sanctions effective tools of diplomacy? Do governments try to sway the nation's trade away from enemies and toward allies due to relative gains concerns? Does foreign aid win compliance? Lars Skålnes's new book refocuses the attention of the field greatly by asking us to consider foreign economic policy as a core component of greatpower grand strategy. The purposeful manipulation of foreign economic ties by national leaders, he argues, is not merely an ancillary instrument in the diplomatic kit of foreign policy elites. Indeed there may be times in which it is the central tool used by powers to secure their strategic objectives. Moreover, Skålnes's framework seeks to identify the specific politicalstrategic conditions that make it more likely or less likely that great powers will build their grand strategies around such policy. This idea should not seem strange to us when we recall initiatives over the past 30 years such as Willy Brandt's Ostpolitik, Henry Kissinger's notion of détente with the Soviet Union, and current American attempts to moderate Chinese behavior by integrating that emerging power more fully into the global economy. While these examples are not treated in the book (Skålnes examines German, French, British, and American cases over different years between 1879 and 1967), they stand as additional instances that might be understood in new ways. Politics, Markets, and Grand Strategy makes a persuasive argument for permanently removing the "low politics" label from foreign economic policy and viewing it instead as coequal with military strategy in the realm of "high politics."

The book's central argument is stated clearly and succinctly in the introductory chapter. It builds directly upon Joanne Gowa's (1994) Allies and Adversaries, in which we learned how great powers will quite purposely structure foreign commercial policy in ways that channel the gains from trade away from adversaries and toward allies. The puzzle, Skålnes tells us, is that careful examination of cases reveals great variation in such policy; i.e., there are times when great powers behave just as Gowa tells us and other times when military and economic policies are divorced from one another and the latter is treated more as a "low politics" tactical tool or is ignored altogether. The author contends that the switching mechanism between these two conditions is the "strategic need" of the country in question. If leaders believe that the nation needs no help in resisting their adversaries, they will not offer favorable economic terms (i.e., access to their own markets in the form of tariff or other concessions) to their allies. If they believe that allies are needed to accomplish their larger objectives, they will select the kinds of policies described by Gowa. Indeed, Skålnes predicts such policies will then become central to their grand strategy.

The author examines the cases of German-Austro-Hungarian relations and French-Russian ties during the decades preceding the World War I; Britain's relations with its Dominions, the United States, France, and Germany during the interwar period; and U.S. relations with Europe and Japan from the end of the World War II until 1967. Alex George's method of structured, focused comparison and George and McKeown's process tracing are employed to test hypotheses derived from the author's central claim. The cases were selected to gain ample variance, both within and between cases, on the independent and dependent variables (strategic need and commercial policy, respectively). Skålnes also provides clear, reproducible, and operational definitions of his key variables (p. 39)—a vital component of good empirical work found all too rarely in case studies. The detailed case material itself is written clearly and well. Skålnes sticks to the point and allows the reader to see when the evidence does and does not fit his main claims. Far too many case studies tell us that "the model fits the data perfectly" (a feat typically accomplished by fuzzy definition of key concepts or selective ransacking of historical materials), but Skålnes's design and careful presentation allows us to learn from his model's failures as well as its successes.

The book's limitations derive from its near-exclusive focus on great-power alliance relations. Aforementioned examples beyond this study—Ostpolitik, détente, and U.S. policy toward China concerning Most Favored Nation status and World Trade Organization accession-all pertain to the use of foreign economic policy toward rivals and adversaries, not allies. Skålnes touches on relations with adversaries when he examines British policy toward Germany in the 1930s (chapter 5) and briefly describes U.S. economic overtures toward the Soviet Union in the immediate postwar years (pp. 156-160). But his twists on the British-German case to make it fit his model are awkward and unworthy of the overall study, and treatment of the U.S.-Soviet case is unsystematic. Regarding economic policy toward adversaries, many readers will conclude that the predictions made by Skålnes's model are simply wrong (Table 1, p. 3). It would also be interesting to contemplate whether the degree of strategic need correlates with the extent of concessions (as the logic of the argument would suggest). The importance of this point is raised when we see that some of the "concessions" identified by Skålnes in certain cases appear quite marginal even though the strategic need was clear (viz., French-Russian relations described in chapter 4.) More consideration of relations between great and small powers would also have been interesting. During the Cold War, for example, one would expect by Skålnes's own criteria that both the United States and the Soviet Union experienced high strategic need. Yet U.S. concessions toward Third World nations were virtually nonexistent, while Soviet subsidization of its small-power, Council for Mutual Economic Assistance partners was very high. Nazi Germany's economic penetration of Hungary and the Balkans, detailed in A. O. Hirschman's classic study (1945), also comes to mind. While I am again pointing to cases outside the scope of this study, consideration of instances like these—perhaps in the concluding chapter—could have prefigured the expansion of Skålnes's framework beyond the limited confines of great-power alliances.

Limitations notwithstanding, Politics, Markets, and Grand Strategy is a solid effort. Skålnes rightly calls for recognition of foreign economic policy as a grand strategic instrument, at times equally if not more important than military plans and programs. As we contemplate the present struggle against global terrorism, one could argue, the United States finds itself in great strategic need of allies—among small and middle powers, recent rivals, and its historic, great-power partners alike. It will be interesting to see whether the United States formulates a new grand strategy that makes meaningful, long-term economic concessions in trade, aid, investment, and technology transfer—especially toward poor nations now on the front lines of this conflict. Skålnes's model, in my reading of it, would predict that the United States will indeed move in that direction. We can all hope that he has it right.

The Helsinki Effect: International Norms, Human Rights, and the Demise of Communism. By Daniel C. Thomas. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2001. 308p. $49.50 cloth, $18.95 paper.

Lawrence J. LeBlanc, Marquette University

The Helsinki Final Act was adopted by the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE) in 1975. Among the basic principles for relations among states that were affirmed in the document were the apparently contradictory principles of nonintervention in the internal affairs of states and respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. Should a collision between these two principles occur, which one would prevail? It was widely assumed at the time, of course, that the principle of nonintervention would win out. The Soviets and their bloc members apparently had no intention of complying with the human rights principles enshrined in the Final Act, and even Western statesmen such as Henry Kissinger downplayed their importance.

There were actually good reasons for skepticism and even cynicism regarding future compliance with the human rights principles of the Helsinki Final Act. After all, by 1975 the international community had adopted numerous human rights instruments of global and regional scope going back to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948. Although it would be an exaggeration to say that nothing had been achieved by those efforts at norm creation, the principle of nonintervention in the internal affairs of states remained a very powerful one and was, in any case, more often than not invoked by authoritarian and totalitarian governments with great effect to ward off "intervention" in their internal affairs in the name of human rights.

Yet only 15 years after Helsinki, by the end of the decade of the 1980s, communist regimes in Eastern Europe and even in the Soviet Union itself were crumbling and the end of the Cold War was in sight. Realist explanations of these developments looked to economic and military factors and trends—the inability of the Soviet system to deliver basic goods and services and/or to compete in an arms race with the United States. In The Helsinki Effect, Daniel Thomas provides a powerful and compelling argument to the effect that the human rights norms of the Helsinki Final Act set the stage for the demise of communism. He draws on a large body of literature and interviews with many important governmental and nongovernmental actors in the United States and Europe to take us through a comprehensive analysis of the evolution, framing, and effects of the human rights norms of the Helsinki Final Act. This analysis is set in the context of an assessment of the explanatory power of Liberal and Constructivist theories of international relations.

The theoretical sophistication of this book is one of its main strengths. There is no effort here to marshal evidence in such a way as to demolish one theory and to argue that another provides the only plausible explanations. On the contrary, the analysis is balanced, though Thomas concludes that Constructivist theory is a more powerful explanatory tool overall. Still, at first glance, Liberal theory, which sees actors as choosing "behaviors that appear most likely to satisfy their preexisting interests within an interdependent international environment" (p. 10), would seem to have provided the best explanation as regards the evolution, framing, and effects of the human rights norms of the Final Act. As far as the evolution of the norms was concerned, throughout most of the CSCE negotiations the Soviet Union and the West European states, as one might have expected in view of their historic positions on such matters, stood at opposite poles regarding incorporating human rights norms in the Final Act. In the end, however, the Soviet Union accepted the norms. and the EC states seemed not to expect much to come of

How does one explain a radically different situation only a few years later, one in which the human rights norms had become very important and even set the stage for the collapse of communism? Thomas argues that the Soviets were, in effect, "trapped" into compliance with the human rights norms. This outcome was surely not intended, but it occurred nonetheless. At the end of the day, the norms mattered. Among other things, they had stimulated the growth of, and given credibility to, dissident groups within the Soviet orbit and provided a basis for external criticism of their human rights policies as well. These developments are best explained in terms of Constructivist theory, which sees actors behaving "in accordance with norms relevant to their identities" (p. 13) and which emphasizes "the intrinsic value that states place on recognition and legitimation by international society" (p. 264). The Soviets wanted legitimacy, and a price they had to pay was compliance with the Helsinki human rights norms.

In the excellent concluding chapter, Thomas summarizes the relative strengths and weaknesses of Liberal and Constructivist theories in explaining the evolution, framing, and effects of the human rights norms of the Helsinki Final Act, and he provides a broad assessment of the implications of his findings. It seems to me that some developments, not mentioned by Thomas, actually make more sense in light of his analysis. Examples include Mikhail Gorbachev's address to the United Nations General Assembly in 1988, in which he called for a strengthening of respect for international law and institutions, thus revamping the traditional Soviet "theory" of international law that stressed national sovereignty and nonintervention in the internal affairs of states; the fundamentally different nature of the debates over human rights issues, at least along East/West lines, that have occurred in the United Nations Commission on Human Rights since the late 1980s; and the much greater willingness of the Soviet Union and then the Russian Federation to accept, and react to, external criticisms of their human rights policies. These developments, too, are arguably part of the Helsinki "effect."

Books of such high quality as this one are relatively rare, and Thomas should be commended for executing it so well. The scholarship is superb. The book is theoretically sophisticated and substantively sound. It is systematically organized and very well written throughout. Indeed, Thomas has an engaging writing style and gets his points across clearly and concisely. It was a pleasure to read this book.

The book will be of interest to a large group of scholars, not only those interested in human rights, but also those concerned with international relations theory, the process of international organization, the development and growth of international regimes, and the impact of norms and social movements in international relations. Historians and others interested in post-Soviet politics will find Thomas's discussion of the breakdown of the communist one-party states fascinating. International lawyers could see in this book the value of interdisciplinary cooperation in understanding how international norms are created and take hold. The book is surely to be required reading in graduate seminars on international action on human rights and many core seminars in international politics. And, because of its excellent coverage of governmental as well as nongovernmental actors in the norm creation process, it would be a very good addition to required reading lists for advanced undergraduates interested in international organizations.

Hierarchy Amidst Anarchy: Transaction Costs and Institutional Choice. By Katja Weber. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2000. 195p. $21.95.

Jeffrey D. Berejikian, University of Geogia

While there are numerous examples of transaction cost analysis in the literature on international cooperation, little of this scholarship concentrates on military collaboration. Indeed, studies like Weber's that explain the varying density of military agreements are rare under any rubric. Weber's offering thus begins to fill an important void in the scholarship on military cooperation.

Weber's main contention is that while traditional realism can explain the distribution of preferences for military cooperation by level of external threat, such arguments cannot predict or explain variation in the level of commitment embodied in final agreements. The existence of an external threat is therefore a necessary condition for military agreements, however, threat alone is not sufficient to explain when and why states agree to curtail significantly their sovereignty in response security challenges. Instead, we understand variation in cooperative forms only when realist insights about threats are integrated into an analysis that also examines the transaction costs unique to military cooperation.

After a brief introduction and overview, chapters 1 and 2 articulate the main argument. The presentation here is concise and logical. Beginning with the assumption that states covet independence, Webber highlights an often underdeveloped distinction between military alliance and confederation. A confederation demands more integration and coordination between partners and, thus, impinges more heavily upon state sovereignty. Then, drawing upon economic arguments regarding the role of transaction costs in cooperation between economic agents, Weber derives an analogous set of costs for states considering military cooperation. These include, uncertainty, asset specificity, technological development, and level of heterogeneity between states. For a given level of security threat, the density of cooperation between states increases as the transaction costs of collaboration rise. Thus, "the higher the level of transaction costs, the greater the likelihood a country will prefer a more binding arrangement" (p. 19).

Importantly, the analysis produces some counterintuitive results. For example, given symmetrical external threat perceptions, binding and dense cooperation (confederation) is more likely between heterogeneous states. The transaction costs between such states are greater because they lack a "similar degree of trust" compared to states that share common cultural or sociological roots (p. 27). Such partners therefore "favor structurally binding security arrangements" as a hedge against opportunism (p. 26). This argument runs counter to much cultural and constructivist scholarship arguing that common identities pave the way to deeper cooperation.

Weber further develops this framework in four empirical chapters. Chapters 3 and 4 examine agreements during and subsequent to the Napoleonic wars. Chapter 5 examines the founding of NATO, while chapter 6 focuses upon the attempt to form a European Defense Community (EDC).

Of these, chapter 3 is the weakest. Webber claims that the cooperation among Austria, Prussia, and Russia—in response to the immediate threat posed by Nepoloanic France—took the form of alliance rather than confederation because of the moderate to low level of transaction costs between partners. While the empirical discussion documenting the transaction costs is well done, the alliances of this period were forged during crisis. Such an immediate threat precludes the possibility of more extensive confederation agreements that would have taken considerably longer to complete. We are then left with a counterfactual case. Webber acknowledges the problem, for example, in the discussion of the Quadruple Alliance, when asking, "Would the allies have sought greater commitments, that is, chosen to confederate" if they had the luxury of more time? Perhaps, but with a counterfactual argument we can only speculate.

The remaining empirical work is stronger. Chapter 4 explains the German and Swiss confederations following the Napoleonic wars in a convincing way. Chapter 5 focuses upon the formation of NATO. The alliance was a compromise between Europe and the United States and is a nice example of the subtly possible under Weber's framework. Both sides agreed on the need for increased military cooperation, however, Europe desired greater formalization to restrain American autonomy. These asymmetric preferences are traced to asymmetric transaction costs. France, for example, faced the highest transaction costs and was most forceful in demanding "ironclad" assurances about U.S. protection (p. 87).

The final empirical chapter examines the attempt to form a European Defense Community. Webber nicely traces the positions of the various participants back to their exposure to transaction costs. However, the EDC seems a curious case from which to derive conclusions about the nature of cooperation given that it failed under French objections. Further, realism alone is the simplest explanation for French obstinacy. The failure of the EDC rests largely in the perception by French leaders that the threat posed by the Soviet Union had diminished. The French government, after downgrading the immediacy of the Soviet threat, concluded that "the costs of a binding security arrangement like the EDC...clearly outweighed the benefits" (p. 106).

As a result, while the theoretical edifice is strong, the empirical work is uneven. Ultimately, the attempt to integrate transaction cost analysis into realism represents important progress, but this potential is often unrealized. The problem here is case selection. The exigencies of the Nepolonic conflict precluded confederation, so no real test is possible, and the EDC failed under French objection.

Still, as an initial attempt to develop an argument about the transaction costs inherent to military cooperation, this is an important and needed contribution that alone justifies the book. The analysis also raises several new issues worthy of further investigation. For example, what role do changing transaction costs play in the evolution and/or devolution of institutions? What are the mechanisms by which they become perceptible to decision makers? How do leaders weight each type of cost? and How do they resolve competing assessments about the nature of such costs? Hierarchy Amidst Anarchy lays important groundwork for a fruitful examination of such questions.

THE ASIAN AMERICAN CENTURY WARREN I. COHEN

Warren Cohen reviews the role of the United States in East Asia over the past century, making a convincing case for American influence in Asia as generally positive. He illustrates specific ways in which American culture has affected Asians, from forms of government to entertainment, and offers valuable insights into the nature of cultural exchange. In a fascinating assessment of the "Asianization" of America, Cohen observes that Asian influences in food, film, music, medicine, and religion are now woven deeply—and permanently—into the American fabric. Indeed, Asians are changing American identity itself: by mid-century, approximately one in ten Americans will boast Asian ancestry. The Edwin O. Reischauer Lectures / $22.95 doth

THE RISE OF SOUTHERN REPUBLICANS EARL BLACK AND MERLE BLACK

"The Black brothers have done it again. The Rise of Southern Republicans is without question the most important book ever written on the role of the South in Congress and the partisan consequences for our national legislature. Far and away the most comprehensive updating of the V.O. Key classic Southern Politics. This is a major work by extremely talented scholars."

-Charles S. Bullock, University of Georgia

The Rise of Southern Republicans provides a compelling account of growing competitiveness in Southern party politics and elections. Through extraordinary research and analysis, the authors track Southern voters' shifting economic, cultural, and religious loyalties, black/white conflicts and interests during and after federal civil rights intervention, and the struggles and adaptations of congressional candidates and officials.

A newly competitive South, the authors argue, means a newly competitive and revitalized America. The story of how the South became a two-party region is ultimately the story of two-party politics in America at the end of the twentieth century. Earl and Merle Black have written a bible for anyone who wants to understand regional and national congressional politics over the past half-century.

TRANSLATED BY ANTHONY ROBERTS

Jihad is the first extensive, in-depth attempt to follow the history and geography of this disturbing political-religious phenomenon. Fluent in Arabic, Kepel has traveled throughout the Muslim world gathering documents, interviews, and archival materials inaccessible to most scholars, in order to give us a comprehensive understanding of the scope of Islamist movements, their past, and their present. As we confront the threat of terrorism to our lives and liberties, Gilles Kepel helps us make sense of the ominous reality of jihad today.

INSIDE THE CUBAN REVOLUTION

Fidel Castro and the Urban Underground

JULIA E. SWEIG

Julia Sweig shatters the mythology surrounding the Cuban Revolution in a compelling revisionist history that reconsiders the revolutionary roles of Fidel Castro and Che Guevara and restores to a central position the leadership of the Cuban urban underground, the Llano. Granted unprecedented access to the classified records of Castro's 26th of July Movement's underground operatives—the only scholar inside or outside of Cuba allowed access to the complete collection in the Cuban Council of State's Office of Historic Affairs—she details the ideological, political, and strategic debates between Castro's mountain-based guerrilla movement and the urban revolutionaries in Havana, Santiago, and other cities.

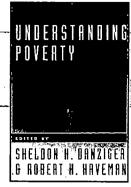

In revealing the true relationship between Castro and the urban underground, Sweig redefines the history of the Cuban Revolution, offering guideposts for understanding Cuban politics in the 1960s and raising intriguing questions for the future transition of power in Cuba.

WHEN ALL ELSE FAILS

Government as the Ultimate Risk Manager

DAVID A. MOSS

One of the most important functions of government—risk management—is one of the least well understood. Moving beyond the most familiar public functions—spending, taxation, and regulation—When All Else Fails spotlights the government's pivotal role as a risk manager. It reveals, as never before, the nature and extent of this governmental function, which touches almost every aspect of economic life.

He sifts through the complicated evaluation research literature and compares the policies that have been adopted to the best evidence about what actually works. He lucidly explains what the major studies show, what they don't, and how they have been misunderstood and misrepresented. $39.95 doth

UNDERSTANDING POVERTY EDITED BY SHELDON H. DANZIGER AND ROBERT H. HAVEMAN

Understanding Poverty brings the problem of poverty in America to the fore, focusing on its nature and extent at the dawn of the twenty-first century. Looking back over the four decades since the nation declared war on poverty, the authors ask how the poor have fared in the market economy, what government programs have and have not accomplished, and what remains to be done.

They help us understand how changes in the way the labor market operates, in family structure, and in social welfare, health, and education policies have affected trends in poverty. Most significantly, they offer suggestions for changes in programs and policies that hold real promise for reducing poverty and income inequality. $24.95 paper

LIBERALISM WITH HONOR SHARON R. KRAUSE

Why do men and women sometimes risk everything to defend their liberties? What motivates principled opposition to the abuse of power? In Liberalism with Honor, Sharon Krause explores honor as a motive for risky and difficult forms of political action. She shows the sense of honor to be an important source of such action and a spring of individual agency more generally. Krause traces the genealogy of honor, including its ties to conscientious objection and civil disobedience, beginning in old-regime France and culminating in the American civil rights movement.

"A very welcome reappraisal of the importance of honor to democratic theory and practice. Krause's study mines the wisdom of Montesquieu to carry us beyond contemporary debates between liberalism and communitarianism, public reason and virtue ethics"

ON BEING NONPROFIT

A Conceptual and Policy Primer

PETER FRUMKIN

This concise and illuminating book provides a road map to the evolving conceptual and policy terrain of the nonprofit sector. Drawing on prominent economic, political, and sociological explanations of nonprofit activity, Peter Frumkin focuses on four important functions that have come to define nonprofit organizations.

The author clarifies the debate over the underlying rationale for the nonprofit and voluntary sector's privileged position in America by examining how nonprofits deliver needed services, promote civic engagement, express values and faith, and channel entrepreneurial impulses. He also exposes the difficult policy questions that have emerged as the boundaries between the nonprofit, business, and government sectors have blurred.

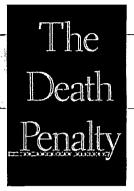

Focusing on nonprofits' growing dependence on public funding, tendency toward political polarization, often idiosyncratic missions, and increasing commercial sm, Peter Frumkin argues that the longterm challenges facing nonprofit organizations will only be solved when they achieve greater balance among their four central functions. $35.00 doth

HISTORY'S MEMORY

Writing America's Past, 1880-1980

ELLEN FITZPATRICK

"The 'new' history—the history of ordinary people, of minorities, of women, of African-Americans, of native Americans, of labor, and of social and economic conflict—how new is it? Ellen Fitzpatrick shows in excellent detail how old and deep a tradition in American historiography it really is, how it emerged in the 1880s, deepened in the 1920s and 30s, and reached maturity long before the so-called 'new' historians of the 1960s and 70s called it their own. Exploring the work of historians and social scientists, especially of the years before World War II, she shows the deep continuities of history 'from the bottom up' and the remarkable achievements of the scholars—some renowned, some obscure—who originated modern social history. An important part of history's memory has been recovered."

UNEQUAL FREEDOM

How Race and Gender Shaped American Citizenship and Labor EVELYN NAKANO GLENN

The inequalities that persist in America have deep historical roots. Evelyn Nakano Glenn untangles this complex history in a unique comparative regional study from the end of Reconstruction to the eve of World War II. She illuminates the complex interplay of local and national forces in American society and provides a dynamic view of how labor and citizenship were defined, enforced, and contested in a formative era for white-nonwhite relations in America.

Citizenship should be "decentered," understood as a commitment to an intergenerational national project, not a basis for denying rights to immigrants. $45.00 cloth

Nationalism and Economic Growth

LIAH GREENFELD

"[An] important new book...Liah Greenfeld argues that patriotism, or nationalism, may have a lot more to do with economic motivation than you think. Most of us have come to accept the economist's view of humanity. On the whole, we are rational actors; we are naturally acquisitive; when political or social barriers are removed, most of us will go off on a determined quest to make money and achieve ever greater success. [Greenfeld] notes that [the] desire to make more and more money is a recent and localized phenomenon. In this magisterial book, one of America's most important contemporary theorists draws on decades of research and thought to present the first work that fully connects Alexis de Tocqueville's political and theoretical lives. In doing so. Sheldon Wolin presents sweeping new interpretations of Tocqueville's major works and of his place in intellectual history.

"Sheldon Wolin has given us a study of Tocqueville worthy of its subject, the greatest interpreter of American democracy. More than a masterful account of Tocqueville's life and thought, Wolin's book is likely to be an enduring work of political theory in its own right." -Michael Sandel, Harvard University Cloth $35.00 ISBN 0-691-07436-4

Organizing America

Wealth, Power, and the Origins of Corporate Capitalism Charles Perrow

American society today is shaped not nearly as much by vast open spaces as it is by vast, bureaucratic organizations. Over half the working population toils away at enterprises with 500 or more employees-up from zero percent in 1800. Is this institutional immensity the logical outcome of technological forces in an all-efficient market, as some have argued? In this book, the first organizational history of nineteenthcentury America, sociologist Charles Perrow says no.

Writing in the tradition of Max Weber, Perrow concludes that the driving force of our history is not technology, politics, or culture, but large, bureaucratic organizations. Cloth $34.95 ISBN 0-691-08954-X

In Defense of a Political Court Terri Jennings Peretti

Can the Supreme Court be free of politics? Do we want it to be? Normative constitutional theory has long concerned itself with the legitimate scope and limits of judicial review. Structural Realism Reconsidered

To predict likely policy developments around the world over the next thirty years, Bueno de Mesquita uses game theoretic models. The tools used in this book have found wide application in business and in the development of significant American foreign policy initiatives over the years, rigorous estimates of future foreign policies.

$21.95 paper $60.00 cloth

Warring Factions focuses on the United States Senate's confirmation process, the constitutional process the Senate uses to approve or reject the president's choices to fill federal government positions. It is a book about history, the evolution, and, arguably, the decline of the process. Most significantly, it is a book that demonstrates the extent to which interest groups and money have transformed the Senate's confirmation process into a virtual circus.

$21.95 paper $60.00 cloth

International Relations and Scientific Progress argues that a theory focusing on the structure of the international system may explain a wider and more interesting range of events in world politics than other alternatives. Such theorizing appears to be out of favor as the result of the apparent failure by structural realism, the most prominent system-level theory over the last two decades, on any number of fronts - most notably an inability to anticipate the ending of the Cold War and its aftermath. $24.95 paper

International Human Rights and Authoritarian Rule in Chile

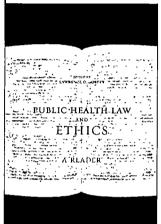

By Darren G. Hawkins

What is the influence of international human rights activism on authoritarian governments in the modern era? How much can pressure from human rights organizations and nations affect political change within a county? This book addresses these key issues by examining the impact of transnational human rights organizations and international norms on Chile during Gen. Augusto Pinochet's regime (1973–90) and afterward.

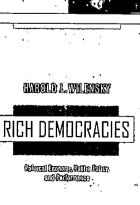

Darren G. Hawkins argues that steadily mounting pressure from abroad concerning human rights did, in fact, make Pinochet more vulnerable over time and helped stimulate Chile's movement to a liberal democracy. Such international expectations could not be ignored by Pinochet, and they gradually and cumulatively made themselves felt. By 1975 some Chilean officials were adopting the discourse of human rights and claiming their adherence to international norms; two years later the government's security apparatus responsible for the reign of terror was reorganized, and disappearances in Chile nearly ceased. In 1980 the regime abandoned its insistence on unlimited authoritarian rule and approved a constitution that set term limits and promised future democratic institutions; Pinochet lost a constitutionally mandated plebiscite in 1988 and ultimately left office in 1990. Hawkins contends that these changes not only were internally driven but reflected an ongoing response to an international discourse on human rights.

Launching Liberalism On Lockean Political Philosophy

Michael P. Zuckert

"Michael Zuckert, an ardent controversialist, revives the dispute over Leo Strauss's interpretation of John Locke, a view now snobbishly ignored. Besides his zest for combat. Zuckert wants to specify the liberalism that Locke launched more exactly and more historically than can be done when Locke is put in a box and kept in his alleged context. This is a book for those who love truth more than peace."

-Harvey C. Mansfield, author of Machiavelli's Virtue

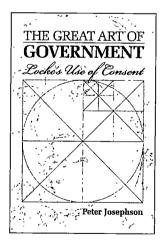

"This collection is not only a set of important essays on Locke, but also a major contribution to our understanding of how Locke's thought informs American political thought. both at the founding and as a critical voice in key contemporary debates in political theory. This now constitutes the most learned and philosophically profound presentation of Lockean thought that has appeared in the past generation." —Thomas L. ### POLICY DYNAMICS

Edited by Frank R. Baumgartner and Bryan D. Jones

"Over the past decade or so, Baumgartner and Jones have gathered a remarkable data set that traces all policy issues receiving public attention at the national level during the post-World War II era. This data set is in itself a tremendous contribution to the study of American politics, and this stellar book will be a mainstay for scholars and for courses on American politics and policy."—Lawrence C. Dodd, author of Congress and the Administrative State

WHY CONGRESSIONAL REFORMS FAIL

Reelection and the House Committee System

E. Scott Adler

"Over the past few decades congressional scholars have identified what they believe to be fundamental changes in the nature of the House. It has become, in their view, much more partisan and much more ideological. Why Congressional Reforms Fail by Scott Adler argues instead that the high level of partisanship currently characterizing the House may have changed the reasons why committee reforms are resisted, but has in no way weakened that resistance. His analyses show that the committee system remains deeply rooted in the electoral connection. Adler's work thus represents a return to the old-time religion of Mayhew, Shepsle, and Fiorina. Congressional scholars need to read this book and need to consider it seriously."—D. Roderick Kiewiet, California Institute of Technology

Black Insurgency and Racial Attitudes in the Civil Rights Era Taeku Lee

"Mobilizing Public Opinion is original and makes its argument ably. Lee critiques 'elite-driven, top-down' accounts of mass opinion with the specific case study of mass support for the civil rights advances in the postwar period. He presents his analysis in a carefully nuanced way and makes a fundamentally important point that is sure to be debated and extended to other cases."—David Sears, University of California, Los Angeles

Human Genetic Engineering and the Rationalization of Public Bioethical Debate

Iohn H. Evans

This book explores the social forces that have led to the thinning out of public debate over human genetic engineering. John H. Evans contends that the problem lies in the structure of the debate itself. Disputes over human genetic engineering concern the means for achieving assumed ends, rather than being a healthy discussion about the ends themselves. The implications of this timely study are twofold. Evans not only explores how decisions about the ethics of human genetic engineering are made, but also shows how the structure of the debate has led to the technological choices we now face.

FAIR NOT FLAT

How to Make the Tax System Better and Simpler Edward J. McCaffery

In this book, Edward J. McCaffery proposes a straightforward and fair alternative to the current tax system. A "fair not flat" tax that is consistent and progressive would tax spending, not income and savings. And if it were collected at its lower levels through a national sales tax, most people would not have to file a return. A supplemental tax on spending for the wealthiest individuals would make the national sales tax progressive.

FELLOWSHIPS

The Radcliffe Institute for Advanced Study at Harvard University awards about 40 fully funded fellowships each year. Radcliffe Institute fellowships support scholars, scientists, artists, and writers of exceptional promise and demonstrated accomplishment who wish to pursue work in academic and professional fields and in the creative arts. Applicants must have received their doctorate or appropriate terminal degree at least two years prior to appointment or made comparable professional achievements in the area of the proposed project. The Radcliffe Institute welcomes proposals from small groups of scholars who have research interests or projects in common.

The stipend amount is $50,000. Fellows receive office space and access to libraries and other resources of Harvard University. Residence in the Boston area and participation in the Institute community are required during the fellowship year, which extends from September 8, 2003, through June 14, 2004. Fellows are expected to present their works-in-progress and to attend other fellows' events.

For more information, visit our Web site at www.radcliffe.edu. For an application, contact the Radcliffe Application Office:

34 Concord Avenue • Cambridge, MA 02138 phone: 617-496-1324 • fax: 617-495-8136 email: fellowships@radcliffe.edu

Applications must be postmarked by October 1, 2002.

The Georgetown Book Prize in International Relations

The Georgetown Book Prize in International Relations is awarded annually by the Mortara Center for International Studies in the Edmund A. Walsh School of Foreign Service and the Department of Government of Georgetown University in memory of Joseph S. Lepgold, Associate Professor of Government and International Relations (1954–2001). The prize, which includes a $1,000 honorarium and an invitation to address a gathering in honor of the recipient, is awarded to the author of the book, published during the preceding calendar year, which makes an exceptional contribution to the study of international relations and international security studies.

We invite submissions from publishers and from third parties. The competition is restricted to single and co-authored books. Edited volumes will not be considered and books must be published in English. Eligible books for the 2002 award must be copyrighted in 2001.

Nominations will be accepted until August 1, 2002. Letters of nomination by publishers or by third parties accompanied by three nonreturnable copies of the book should be sent to the address below. Selection for the Georgetown Prize is made by a faculty committee on the basis of books submitted.

Submissions should be sent to:

Why Join The American Political Science Association?

To participate in the advancement of the discipline and the profession.

he American Political Science Association is the major professional society for those engaged in the study of politics. Our mission is to reach out to scholars, teachers, students, and others throughout the world to facilitate learning, teaching, and research in the field of political science.

To do so, we promote scholarly research and communication, promote high quality teaching and education about politics and government, work to diversify the profession and represent its diversity, increase academic and non-academic opportunities for members, seek to strengthen the professional environment for political science, represent the professional interests of political scientists, defend the legitimacy of scholarly research into politics and government, recognize outstanding work in the discipline, encourage the application of rigorous ethical and intellectual standards in the profession, and seek to serve the public, including disseminating research and preparing citizens to be effective citizens and political participants.

To invest in the professional development of your own career.

Notes from the Editor

The first thing most readers will notice about this issue is the cover, which is colored blue this time and is adorned by a clock to signify "Taking Temporality Seriously," the first article in the issue. After noting the cover (admiringly, I hope) and browsing through the table of contents, readers are hereby invited to shift their attention briefly to the roster of editorial board members inside the cover. There they will see something new: as previewed in an earlier "Notes from the Editor," an executive committee of the Review's editorial board is now in operation. The six-member executive committee consists of four representatives of major subfields of the discipline (Darren Davis for American politics, James Morrow for international politics, Kirstie McClure for political theory, and Sven Steinmo for comparative politics) and two "at-large" members (Neta Crawford and Robert Goodin). The members of the executive committee are intended to be the "first among equals" in advising me on matters of editorial policy, serving as an initial sounding board and source of new ideas before issues come to the full editorial board. Pertinent examples of the committee's responsibilities include planning an appropriate commemoration of the Review's centenary and revisiting our procedures for handling "Forum" submissions and responses. Executive committee members also constitute a first line of defense in advising me when issues arise concerning particular manuscripts, though such responsibilities tend to be infrequent and, given the diversity of the manuscripts we consider, are fairly widely dispersed among members of the editorial board rather than confined solely to executive committee members. All editorial board members also share responsibility for "recruiting" promising manuscripts within their areas of expertise, but executive committee members are asked to be especially active in this regard. Finally, it is the executive committee that will, early in 2003, review the performance of our editorial office in general and my performance as editor in particular. With the latter point in mind, I want to emphasize (1) that I selected the executive committee with an eye toward diversity of various sorts (substantive, theoretical, methodological, demographic, and so on), and (2) that the executive committee consists of individuals with whom I have not been associated professionally or personally, apart from my familiarity with their work, and with whom I have no more than a nodding acquaintance, if that.

Let me also take this occasion to alert or remind readers that the December issue of the Review will be the last one in which book reviews appear. The book review operation, under the continuing editorship of Susan Bickford and Gregory McAvoy, is shifting over to the APSA's new journal, Perspectives on Politics, the first issue of which is scheduled to appear during the first quarter of 2003. Jennifer Hochschild, the editor of Perspectives on Politics, has announced ambitious plans for a journal that will, in her words, "enable members of different subfields of political science to speak to one another—and with knowledgeable people outside the discipline—on issues of common interest."

Of course, that is a worthy aspiration for the Review as well, notwithstanding differences between its mission and that of the new journal. Besides book reviews, Perspectives on Politics will feature review essays, research articles that are more broadly focused than standard reports of individual research results, and "intervention" essays (brief commentaries on some political phenomenon or problem, exchanges about substantive or methodological issues, and introductions to or assessments of new ideas and trends). The advent of the new journal is an exciting development for our discipline, and I look forward to its appearance early next year.

IN THIS ISSUE

In this issue's first article, Tim Büthe takes political scientists to task for their inattention to the historical dimension. The proper role of history in political analysis has been a source of heated debate, and oceans of ink have been spilled in attempts to determine where and how history "fits." Going beyond this debate in "Taking Temporality Seriously: Modeling History and the Use of Narratives as Evidence," Büthe suggests ways to improve models by incorporating historical narratives. This exploration of the use and abuse of historical analysis by political scientists, though unlikely to settle major issues with finality, impressed our reviewers as having the potential to direct the ongoing debate in productive new directions.

Also likely to spur controversy is Arash Abizadeh's "Does Liberal Democracy Presuppose a Cultural Nation? Four Arguments." In this essay, Abizadeh challenges the idea that liberal democracy is viable only within the context of a single cultural nation. Drawing from diverse approaches to political theory, he contends that the identity derived from a cultural nation (defined in linguistic-cultural terms) may undermine democratic principles and may fail to take into account multinational and post-national contexts. By systematically reconsidering widely accepted ideas about cultural requisites, this analysis should constitute a fine starting point for creating a broader normative theory of liberal democracy.

In contrast to many political scientists who study the American judicial system, Howard Gillman perceives the courts as enmeshed within party regimes rather than as an outside force constraining or balancing political parties. In "How Political Parties Can Use the Courts to Advance Their Agendas: Federal Courts in the United States, 1875–1891," Gillman details the changing and expanding role of the federal courts in advancing the long-term Republican goal of altering America's economic foundations. In a study whose implications extend far beyond the courts and the U.S., Gillman addresses key issues of constitutionalism, institutionalization, and political development.

Whereas Gillman focuses specifically on a particular period and place, the question of "What is virtue?" knows no temporal or spatial boundaries. This question is at the center of a lively and often heated debate among contemporary political theorists. However, as Robert Bartlett argues in "Socratic Political Philosophy and the Problem of Virtue," the responses that have been offered to date are problematic. Virtue, he contends, cannot be reduced to a dichotomy between public and private good, individual and community, duty and happiness. Based on his intensive exegesis of Plato's Meno, Bartlett suggests that including nobility in the definition of virtue will bridge the dichotomies of previous scholarship.

Two contributions to this issue focus on gender politics. In the first, Eileen McDonagh tries to explain how women win the rights to vote and hold office and how much representation they gain in national legislatures. In "Political Citizenship and Democratization: The Gender Paradox," McDonagh challenges conventional wisdom by arguing that liberal principles that protect individual rights, such as suffrage and equality, do not explain the extension of political rights to women. Analyzing the constitutions of 190 countries and presenting an in-depth case study of the process through which women won suffrage in the United States, McDonagh shows that national differences in extending greater rights to women reflect the extent to which constitutions embrace both group and individual rights. Paradoxically, the political inclusion of women stems from a dual emphasis on what defines them as a group (i.e., their difference from men) and their status as individuals who deserve the same rights as all other individuals.

In "Lipstick and Logarithms: Gender, Identity, Institutional Context, and Representative Bureaucracy," Lael Keiser, Vicky Wilkins, Kenneth Meier, and Catherine Holland shift from McDonagh's focus on the "descriptive" representation of women to the next logical question: Does "descriptive" or "passive" representation lead to "substantive" or "active" representation? Evidence of gains for racial minorities through passive representation has been abundantly documented, but gains for women are not well documented. As a test case, Keiser and her colleagues ask whether female students in schools with more women math teachers perform better on standardized math tests. Their analysis brings new data to bear on an issue that has important policy implications, while speaking to an array of issues in feminist, democratic, and neoinstitutionalist theories.

In "Self-Interest, Social Security, and the Distinctive Participation Patterns of Senior Citizens," Andrea Louise Campbell's point of departure is the well known positive correlation between personal income and political participation in the United States. Although that relationship is well established, Campbell uncovers an intriguing exception: It reverses for senior citizens when Social Security comes into play. Social Security occupies a unique status as a government policy that the poor depend on more than the rich, but also as one to which no "welfare" stigma is attached because it is considered earned. Thus, Social Security mobilizes the elderly segment of the poor population to act politically in their own self-interest in a way unmatched by other economic policies. This study will have to be taken into account in future analyses of the socioeconomic bases of mass political behavior and of the role of self-interest in shaping political attitudes.

A simple account of the timing of elections in parliamentary systems rests on the idea that officeholders behave strategically, calling new elections when they think their party's prospects are brighter than they are likely to be in the future. In "Strategic Parliamentary Dissolution," however, Kaare Strøm and Stephen Swindle contend that the matter is not nearly that simple, for the conventional account ignores institutional arrangements imposed on leaders by their countries' constitutions. By cataloguing the diverse set of pertinent constitutional provisions, constructing and solving games in which payoffs to the incumbents are based on these provisions, and using data on 192 elections in 18 parliamentary democracies to test hypotheses derived from these games, Strøm and Swindle greatly enrich our understanding of this familiar parliamentary tactic. More broadly, they provide superb demonstrations of the impact of institutional arrangements and of the fruitful interplay between formal theory and em-

Finally, in "Commerce, Coalitions, and Factor Mobility: Evidence from Congressional Votes on Trade Legislation," Michael Hiscox notes that at some points in U.S. history, conflict over international trade has centered on broad class divisions. At other times, though, the conflict has been between narrower and more fluid coalitions of industries. Hiscox invokes factor mobility—"the ease with which owners of factors of production (land, labor, and capital) can move between industries"—to identify the points at which an industrybased coalitions model has been a better predictor of congressional voting on international trade issues than a class-based model. His analysis helps us understand the divisiveness of tariff and trade issues, and has direct implications for pluralist and Marxist models of political conflict.

INSTRUCTIONS TO CONTRIBUTORS

General Considerations

The APSR strives to publish scholarly research of exceptional merit, focusing on important issues and demonstrating the highest standards of excellence in conceptualization, exposition, methodology, and craftsmanship. Because the APSR reaches a diverse audience of scholars and practitioners, authors must demonstrate how their analysis illuminates a significant research problem, or answers an important research question, of general interest in political science. For the same reason, authors must strive for a presentation that will be understandable to as many scholars as possible, consistent with the nature of their material.

The APSR publishes original work. Therefore, authors should not submit articles containing tables, figures, or substantial amounts of text that have already been published or are forthcoming in other places, or that have been included in other manuscripts submitted for review to book publishers or periodicals (including on-line journals). In many such cases, subsequent publication of this material would violate the copyright of the other publisher. The APSR also does not consider papers that are currently under review by other journals or duplicate or overlap with parts of larger manuscripts that have been submitted to other publishers (including publishers of both books and periodicals). Submission of manuscripts substantially similar to those submitted or published elsewhere, or to part of a book or other larger work, is also strongly discouraged. If you have any questions about whether these policies apply in your particular case, you should discuss any such publications related to a submission in a cover letter to the Editor. You should also notify the Editor of any related submissions to other publishers, whether for book or periodical publication, that occur while a manuscript is under review by the APSR and which would fall within the scope of this policy. The Editor may request copies of related publications.

If your manuscript contains quantitative evidence and analysis, you should describe your procedures in sufficient detail to permit reviewers to understand and evaluate what has been done and, in the event that the article is accepted for publication, to permit other scholars to carry out similar analyses on other data sets. For example, for surveys, at the least, sampling procedures, response rates, and question wordings should be given; you should calculate response rates according to one of the standard formulas given by the American Association for Public Opinion Research, Standard Definitions: Final Dispositions of Case Codes and Outcome Rates for RDD Telephone Surveys and In-Person Household Surveys (Ann Arbor, MI: AAPOR, 1998). This document is available on the Internet at http://www.aapor.org/ethics/stddef.html. For experiments, provide full descriptions of experimental protocols, methods of subject recruitment and selection, subject payments and debriefing procedures, and so on. Articles should be self-contained, so you should not simply refer readers to other publications for descriptions of these basic research procedures.

Please indicate variables included in statistical analyses by capitalizing the first letter in the variable name and italicizing the entire variable name the first time each is mentioned in the text. You should also use the same names for variables in text and tables and, wherever possible, should avoid the use of acronyms and computer abbreviations when discussing variables in the text. All variables appearing in tables should have been mentioned in the text and the reason for their inclusion discussed.

As part of the review process, you may be asked to submit additional documentation if procedures are not sufficiently clear; the review process works most efficiently if such information is given in the initial submission. If you advise readers that additional information is available, you should submit printed copies of that information with the manuscript. If the amount of this supplementary information is extensive, please inquire about alternate procedures.

The APSR uses a double-blind review process. You should follow the guidelines for preparing anonymous copies in the Specific Procedures section below.

Manuscripts that are largely or entirely critiques or commentaries on previously published APSR articles will be reviewed using the same general procedures as for other manuscripts, with one exception. In addition to the usual number of reviewers, such manuscripts will also be sent to the scholar(s) whose work is being criticized, in the same anonymous form that they are sent to reviewers. Comments from the original author(s) to the Editor will be invited as a supplement to the advice of reviewers. This notice to the original author(s) is intended (1) to encourage review of the details of analyses or research procedures that might escape the notice of disinterested reviewers; (2) to enable prompt publication of critiques by supplying criticized authors with early notice of their existence and, therefore, more adequate time to reply; and (3) as a courtesy to criticized authors. If you submit such a manuscript, you should therefore send as many additional copies of their manuscripts as will be required for this purpose.

Manuscripts being submitted for publication should be sent to Lee Sigelman, Editor, American Political Science Review, Department of Political Science, The George Washington University, 2201 G Street N.W., Room 507, Washington, DC 20052. Correspondence concerning manuscripts under review may be sent to the same address or e-mailed to apsr@gwu.edu.

Manuscript Formatting

Manuscripts should not be longer than 45 pages including text, all tables and figures, notes, references, and appendices. This page size guideline is based on the  $\overline{\text{U.S.}}$  standard  $8.5 \times 11$ -inch paper; if you are submitting a manuscript printed on longer paper, you must adjust accordingly. The font size must be at least 11 points for all parts of the paper, including notes and references. The entire paper, including notes and references, must be double-spaced, with the sole exception of tables for which double-spacing would require a second page otherwise not needed. All pages should be numbered in one sequence, and text should be formatted using a normal single column no wider than 6.5 inches, as is typical for manuscripts (rather than the double-column format of the published version of the APSR), and printed on one side of the page only. Include an abstract of no more than 150 words. The APSR style of embedded citations should be used, and there must be a separate list of references at the end of the manuscript. Do not use notes for simple citations. These specifications are designed to make it easier for reviewers to read and evaluate papers. Papers not adhering to these guidelines are subject to being rejected without review.

Notes from the Editor September 2002

For submission and review purposes, you may place footnotes at the bottom of the pages instead of using endnotes, and you may locate tables and figures (on separate pages and only one to a page) approximately where they fall in the text. However, manuscripts accepted for publication must be submitted with endnotes, and with tables and figures on separate pages at the back of the manuscript with standard indications of text placement, e.g., [Table 3 about here]. In deciding how to format your initial submission, please consider the necessity of making these changes if your paper is accepted. If your paper is accepted for publication, you will also be required to submit camera-ready copy of graphs or other types of figures. Instructions will be provided.

For specific formatting style of citations and references, please refer to articles in the most recent issue of the APSR. For unusual style or formatting issues, you should consult the latest edition of The Chicago Manual of Style. For review purposes, citations and references need not be in specific APSR format, although some generally accepted format should be used, and all citation and reference information should be provided.

Specific Procedures

Please follow these specific procedures for submission:

- 1. You are invited to submit a list of scholars who would be appropriate reviewers of your manuscript. The Editor will refer to this list in selecting reviewers, though there obviously can be no guarantee that those you suggest will actually be chosen. Do not list anyone who has already commented on your paper or an earlier version of it, or any of your current or recent collaborators, institutional colleagues, mentors, students, or close friends.
- 2. Submit five copies of manuscripts and a diskette containing the word-processed version of the manuscript. Please ensure that the paper and diskette versions you submit are identical; the diskette version should be of the anonymous copy (see below). Please review all pages of all copies to make sure that all copies contain all tables, figures, appendices, and bibliography mentioned in the manuscript and that all pages are legible. Label the diskette clearly with the (first) author's name and the title of the manuscript (in abridged form if need be), and identify the word processing program and operating system.
- 3. To comply with the APSR's procedure of double-blind peer reviews, only one of the five copies submitted should be fully identified as to authorship and four should be in anonymous format.
- 4. For anonymous copies, if it is important to the development of the paper that your previous publications be cited, please do this in a way that does not make the authorship of the submitted paper obvious. This is usually most easily accomplished by referring to yourself in the third person and including normal references to the work cited in the list of references. In no circumstances should your prior publications be included in the bibliography in their normal alphabetical location but with your name deleted. Assuming that text references to your previous work are in the third person, you should include full citations as usual in the bibliography. Please discuss the use of other procedures to render manuscripts anonymous with the Editor prior to submission. You should not thank colleagues in notes or elsewhere in the body of the paper or mention institution names, web page addresses, or other potentially identifying information. All acknowledgments must appear on the title page of the identified copy only. Manuscripts that are judged not anonymous will not be reviewed.

5. The first page of the four anonymous copies should contain only the title and an abstract of no more than 150 words. The first page of the identified copy should contain (a) the name, academic rank, institutional affiliation, and contact information (mailing address, telephone, fax, e-mail address) for all authors; (b) in the case of multiple authors, an indication of the author who will receive correspondence; (c) any relevant citations to your previous work that have been omitted from the anonymous copies; and (d) acknowledgments, including the names of anyone who has provided comments on the manuscript. If the identified copy contains any unique references or is worded differently in any way, please mark this copy with "Contains author citations" at the top of the first page.

No copies of submitted manuscripts can be returned.

ELECTRONIC ACCESS TO THE APSR

Back issues of the APSR are available in several electronic formats and through several vendors. Except for the last three years (as an annually "moving wall"), back issues of the APSR beginning with Volume 1, Number 1 (November 1906), are available on-line through JSTOR (http://wwwjstor.org/). At present, JSTOR's complete journal collection is available only via institutional subscription, e.g., through many college and university libraries. For APSA members who do not have access to an institutional subscription to JSTOR, individual subscriptions to its APSR content are available. Please contact Member Services at APSA for further information, including annual subscription fees.

Individual members of the American Political Science Association can access recent issues of the APSR and PS through the APSA website (www.apsanet.org) with their username and password. Individual nonmember access to the online edition will also be available, but only through institutions that hold either a print-plus-electronic subscription or an electronic-only subscription, provided the institution has registered and activated its online subscription.

Full text access to current issues of both the APSR and PS is also available on-line by library subscription from a number of database vendors. Currently, these include University Microfilms Inc. (UMI) (via its CD-ROMs General Periodicals Online and Social Science Index and the on-line database ProQuest Direct), Online Computer Library Center (OCLC) (through its on-line database First Search as well as on CD-ROMs and magnetic tape), and the Information Access Company (IAC) (through its products Expanded Academic Index, InfoTrac, and several on-line services [see below]). Others may be added from time to time.

The APSR is also available on databases through six online services: Datastar (Datastar), Business Library (Dow Jones), Cognito (IAC), Encarta Online Library (IAC), IAC Business (Dialog), and Newsearch (Dialog).

The editorial office of the APSR is not involved in the subscription process to either JSTOR for back issues or the other vendors for current issues. Please contact APSA, your reference librarian, or the database vendor for further information about availability.

BOOK REVIEWS

All books for review should be sent directly to the APSR Book Review Editors, Susan Bickford and Greg McAvoy. The address is Susan Bickford and Gregory McAvoy, American Political Science Review Book Review Editors, Department of Political Science, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, CB No. 3265, Chapel Hill, NC 27599-3265. E-mail: apsrbook@unc.edu.

If you are the author of a book you wish to be considered for review, please ask your publisher to send a copy to the APSR Book Review Editors per the mailing instructions above. If you are interested in reviewing books for the APSR, please send your vita to the Book Review Editors; you should not ask to review a specific book.

EXPEDITING REQUESTS FOR COPYING APSR AND PS ARTICLES FOR CLASS USE AND OTHER PURPOSES

Class Use

The Comprehensive Publisher Photocopy Agreement between APSA and the Copyright Clearance Center (CCC) permits bookstores and copy centers to receive expedited clearance to copy articles from the APSR and PS in compliance with the Association's policies and applicable fees. The general fee for articles is 75 cents per copy. However, current Association policy levies no fee for the first 10 copies of a printed artide, whether in course packs or on reserve. Smaller classes that rely heavily on articles (i.e., upper-level undergraduate and graduate classes) can take advantage of this provision, and faculty ordering 10 or fewer course packs should bring it to the attention of course pack providers. APSA policy also permits free use of the electronic library reserve, with no limit on the number of students who can access the electronic reserve. Both large and small classes that rely on these articles can take advantage of this provision. The CCC's address, telephone, and fax are 222 Rosewood Drive, Danvers, MA 01923, (978) 750-8400 (voice), and (978) 750-4474 (fax). This agreement pertains only to the reproduction and distribution of APSA materials as hard copies (e.g., photocopies, microfilm, and microfiche).

The Association of American Publishers (AAP) has created a standardized form for college faculty to submit to a copy center or bookstore to request copyrighted material for course packs. The form is available through the CCC, which will handle copyright permissions.

APSA also has a separate agreement pertaining to CCC's Academic E-Reserve Service. This agreement allows electronic access for students and instructors of a designated class at a designated institution for a specified article or set of articles in electronic format. Access is by password for the duration of a class.

Please contact your librarian, the CCC, or the APSA Reprints Department for further information.

APSR Authors

If you are the author of an APSR article, you may use your article in course packs or other printed materials without payment of royalty fees and you may post it at personal or institutional web sites as long as the APSA copyright notice is included.

Other Uses of APSA-Copyrighted Materials

For any further copyright issues, please contact the APSA Reprints Department.

INDEXING

Articles appearing in the APSR before June 1953 were indexed in The Reader's Guide to Periodical Literature. Current issues are indexed in ABC Pol Sci; America, History and Life 1954—; Book Review Index; Current Contents: Social and Behavioral Sciences; EconLit; Energy Information Abstracts; Environmental Abstracts; Historical Abstracts; Index of Economic Articles; Information Service Bulletin; International Index; International Political Science Abstracts; the Journal of Economic Literature; Periodical Abstracts;

Public Affairs; Recently Published Articles; Reference Sources; Social Sciences and Humanities Index; Social Sciences Index; Social Work Research and Abstracts; and Writings on American History. Some of these sources may be available in electronic form through local public or educational libraries. Microfilm of the APSR, beginning with Volume 1, and the index of the APSR through 1969 are available through University Microfilms Inc., 300 North Zeeb Road, Ann Arbor, MI 48106 (www.umi.com). The Cumulative Index to the American Political Science Review, Volumes 63 to 89: 1969–95, is available through the APSA.

Taking Temporality Seriously: Modeling History and the Use of Narratives as Evidence

TIM BÜTHE Columbia University

Social scientists interested in explaining historical processes can, indeed should, refuse the choice between modeling causal relationships and studying history. Identifying temporality as the defining characteristic of processes that can be meaningfully distinguished as "history," I show that modeling such phenomena engenders particular difficulties but is both possible and fruitful. Narratives, as a way of presenting empirical information, have distinctive strengths that make them especially suited for historical scholarship, and structuring the narratives based on the model allows us to treat them as data on which to test the model. At the same time, this use of narratives raises methodological problems not identified in recent debates. I specify these problems, analyze their implications, and suggest ways of solving or minimizing them. There is no inherent incompatibility between—but much potential gain from—modeling history and using historical narratives as data.

cross the empirical subfields of political science, we find in recent years a renewed and growing interest in "historical macro-analysis" (Katznelson 1997, 82), which seeks to understand and causally explain processes with an important temporal dimension, such as the formation and evolution of formal and informal social institutions. This trend has given rise to "historical institutionalism" (for overviews see Hall and Taylor 1996; Immergut 1998; Robertson 1993; Thelen 1999), which manifests itself in much of the newer literature on the welfare state and state formation in comparative politics and in the literature on American political development. In international relations, manifestations of this trend toward historical scholarship range from the interest in domestic and international institutions to the postmortem debate over the nature of the Cold War. Does this interest in historical processes merely expand the subject matter of political science or does it raise particular methodological problems that require a distinct approach to theorizing and to the presentation of empirical information to test the plausibility or validity of our explanations?<sup>1</sup>

Tim Büthe is the 2001/2002 Lindt Fellow of Columbia University, completing a Ph.D. in the Department of Political Science on the impact of partisan politics on business confidence in the context of globalization and variations in political and economic institutions. In 2002/2003, he will be a James Bryant Conant Fellow at the Center for European Studies at Harvard University, 27 Kirkland Street, Cambridge, MA 02138 (tim.buthe@columbia.edu, http://www.buthe.net).

For fruitful discussions and helpful comments on various earlier versions of this paper I thank Jim Alt, Ruth Ben-Artzi, Charles Cameron, Derek Chollet, Lewis Edinger, Peter Hall, Robert Keohane, Robert Lieberman, Sarah Lindemann, Solomon Major, Walter Mattli, Paul McDonald, Helen Milner, Andrew Nathan, Matt Nelson, Dan Nexon, Jamie O'Connell, Jack Snyder, Hendrik Spruyt, Barry Weingast, the members of the Institutions Workshop at Columbia University, and, especially, Ira Katznelson. I also thank three anonymous reviewers for exceptionally thoughtful comments and constructive criticisms. I have benefited from financial support from the Graduate School of Arts and Sciences and the Department of Political Science at Columbia University and, during the final stages of this research while an Exchange Scholar at Stanford University, from the hospitality of Stanford's Department of Political Science.

To advance and extend the methodological debate on this general question, I examine two sets of specific issues. First, what defines "history" as a distinct object of study? What are the implications of such a conception of history for developing explicit theoretical models? Is there an inherent incompatibility between modeling and the quest for explanation and narration of "history," as some observers suggest (e.g., Elster 2000)? Based on an inclusive conception of modeling and an explicit conception of "history" as processes rendered distinctive by the importance of temporality, I argue that modeling such processes is particularly difficult but, nonetheless, possible and desirable. Far from being inherently futile, modeling history is extremely useful, not least because models, by emphasizing the general, help us clarify what is historically and contextually specific when we examine the historical record. Consequently, the "historic turn in the human sciences" (McDonald 1996a) need not lead us away from what scholars of very different persuasions have identified as the particular strength and source of progress of American political science: the explicit modeling of the political phenomena we seek to explain, so as to facilitate scrutiny of the deductive logic of the explanation (see, e.g., Milner 1998, and Wæver 1998).

Second, because most historical work in political science is narrative in form, I examine the relationship between models and narratives and, more generally, the strengths and weaknesses of narratives as a type of "presentation of the results" of our analysis (Skocpol 1995, 44). Here, my focus differs from much recent work that concentrates on narratives as a source of empirical information for the analyst, either broadly, conceptualizing all empirical information as "text" to be interpreted (Ricoeur [1971] 1979), or more narrowly, concentrating on specific oral and written "histories" in the form of narratives as constitutive elements of ideas and norms (e.g., Anderson [1983] 1991; Finnemore 1996; Finnemore and Sikkink 1998) with interesting implications for policy (e.g., Van Evera 1994, 36f). These works have been joined by predominantly methodological contributions (e.g., Heise 1993; Lustick 1996), which often seek to raise social scientists' awareness of historians' carefully developed methods to discern internal validity through the "critical use of sources." All of those works are concerned with narratives as the raw material—as (primary or secondary) sources—for the analysis. In contrast, I focus on narratives written by scholars to present the results of their empirical analysis, providing information about actors, institutions, events, and relationships in "a single coherent story, albeit with subplots" (Stone 1987, 74) to provide empirical support for a theoretical argument. Insofar as they are independent of the information used to construct the model, these narratives can serve as data to test the model or as "evidence" to support the model's plausibility.<sup>2</sup>

Using narratives to provide empirical support for one's model has a number of benefits, especially when we seek to examine explanations for historical processes with an important temporal dimension, but it also raises methodological questions that warrant closer attention. Specifically, how do we delineate a sequence of events so as to justify the imposition of a narrative beginning and end onto a continuous empirical record? How does the imposition of a narrative closure affect the generality of our conclusions? What is a narrative's "truth claim?" How useful are narratives for the assessment of alternative explanations? These questions—and how we answer them—matters not only for scholars interested in historical work. The evidentiary status that we attribute to a narrative as a consequence of our conclusions about the relationship between author-scholar and narrative, for instance, affects our reading (and writing) of all work that uses prose to present its empirical results.

I analyze the problems identified by these questions and suggest ways of minimizing their impact on the validity of our findings and the confidence we can have in them. I show how the theoretical model can help structure narratives in ways that make them more suitable as tests and how the use of multiple narratives can increase our confidence in the model, illustrating my arguments with examples drawn from the literature on the state and regime change. I conclude that a careful combination of models and narratives yields clearer insights with greater confidence than a return to untheorized history writing with its often vast hidden causal assumptions and claims. It thus allows the integration of rigorous theorizing and the study of historical processes in a manner that is attentive to, and respectful of, the historical record (cf. Evans 1995, 3f).

MODELING

Any attempt to answer the question of whether modeling and the study of history are incompatible should start with explicit definitions of modeling and history. I take a model to be a schematic statement of a theoretical argument, a hypothesized parsimonious abstraction or simplification of "reality" that depicts a deductively sound, systematic, regular relationship between specified aspects of reality and helps to explain that relationship. Modeling to provide causal explanations, we customarily start by designating the explanandum as the "dependent variable" and its hypothesized causes as the "independent variables." Modeling, however, must go beyond identifying regularities in a Hempelian fashion by also specifying the causal mechanisms through which the elements are linked in a regular way (Coase [1981] 1994; Elster 1989, 3–10; Tilly 1997). The resulting models allow us, with the help of specified assumptions, to derive specific hypotheses about the explanandum, given particular "values" for the independent variables—though the specificity may be restricted to predicting the direction of change in the explanandum.4 Whether employing the logic of instrumental rationality or not, whether assuming perfect strategic and computational capabilities or more limited ones, whether working quantitatively or qualitatively, we model to emphasize what we consider to be the most important, systematic, and in that sense generalizable elements of the phenomena we seek to explain.

Insofar as the nature of the explanandum permits, a more formal exposition of the model tends to facilitate checking "a system of causal generalizations...for internal consistency and for conclusions that are not intuitively obvious at the outset" (McClelland 1975, 114), as Robert Powell (1999, 99–102) illustrates in his spirited defense of the promise and practice of formal modeling in security studies. The language of mathematics is particularly suited for scrutinizing the deductive logic of an argument—and using it does not require making rational choice assumptions, as Barry O'Neill's (e.g., 2001) work illustrates—but it also imposes costs on author and reader, which may or may not have corresponding benefits for particular questions and individuals. In short, formalization has some advantages, but a model need not be formal. Rather, the defining characteristic of a model is that it provides an explicit, deductively sound statement of the theoretical argument, separate from a particular empirical context.

By forcing us to specify the elements of our arguments, such as actors and their goals, modeling should increase clarity and explicitness, reducing ambiguity and vagueness. That said, in practice, models often are not explicit about all elements of the analysis. Particularly when one mode of analysis dominates a discipline, its core assumptions are often dropped from discussion. These assumptions remain a central part of the analysis, but they are no longer mentioned and may be "smuggled in" and thus become "immune to rational criticism" (Barry 1985, 282). Yet, although modeling can be a rhetorical device to hide one's values or other assumptions (McCloskey 1998), it need not be; and explicit modeling surely makes it easier to detect hidden assumptions than leaving the theoretical argument implicit.

Modeling as such, then, does not require any particular ontological, epistemological, or substantive assumptions, though any specific model will have to make them and should make them explicit to facilitate their empirical as well as their analytical scrutiny. By definition, assumptions must be "unrealistic" or "inaccurate" in the sense of being incomplete. But if assumptions are manifestly empirically wrong—as in Milton Friedman's ([1953] 1979, 30) (in) famous example of the leaf-growth pattern on a tree—they cause two major problems. First is the familiar problem of the joint hypothesis test: It will be impossible to tell whether empirical disconfirmation of a hypothesis derived from a model with such assumptions is due to a flaw or omission in the model or due to the erroneous assumptions. Second, when predictions that are based on manifestly wrong assumptions are confirmed empirically, such findings are not very useful, because the models based on such assumptions provide little insight into how the outcomes came about (Coase [1981] 1994, 17). Policy that seeks to achieve or avoid these outcomes, if based on such models, is likely to be ineffective and might be outright dangerous.

The final point to be made before turning to a definition of "history" concerns the roles of deduction and induction in modeling. Deduction is of central importance for the ex ante identification of the elements—the types of (f)actors—that constitute the building blocks of a possible model. It is also the central heuristic tool for formulating logically sound relationships among these elements, consistent with the model's core ontological assumptions and consistent with the assumptions driving the causal mechanisms, which themselves are usually derived from very general theories of the constraints, motivations, and cognitive processes employed in decision making and thus shaping human agency. But a model based solely on deduction from assumptions is a shell consisting of "empty theoretical boxes" (Bonnell 1980, 162; see also Smelser 1967, 22ff, 32); it needs empirical content in order to make predictions about what we should observe in a particular instance. To be sure, this content could be supplied by further assumptions that are only subsequently subjected to empirical scrutiny (Kiser and Hechter 1998, 799ff, 802ff), but if we truly had no empirical knowledge at all, what would be the basis for such conjectures? In practice, therefore, the empirical content will probably be supplied inductively.<sup>5</sup> Moreover, induction often has a further role in the modeling process, especially when empirical disconfirmation of our initial model leads us to the inductive discovery of additional explanatory factors that can account for the anomalies. Integrating these factors systematically into the model is surely preferable to having them remain extraneous and theoretically irrelevant (cf. Smelser 1967, 33, 35), as long as we keep in mind that the inductive addition of "auxiliary hypotheses" without subsequent separate tests leads only to hypotheses, not conclusions (King, Keohane, and Verba 1994, 21f, 101ff; Lakatos [1970] 1974, 117f).6 That said, even works that are entirely inductive would benefit in two ways from making their argument explicit and separating it as a model from the particular case on which it is based. First, such a separation forces the author to distinguish between the conceptually abstract elements of causal relationships and their particular manifestations. This distinction is a prerequisite for assessing validity (see Adcock and Collier 2001): Investigating whether we are indeed "measuring what we think we are measuring" (King, Keohane, and Verba 1994, 25) is nearly impossible if the argument is presented exclusively in operationalized form. Second, such a separation induces the author to specify which parts of the explanation are strictly historicallycontextually specific and to differentiate them from the parts that constitute a "potentially generalizable model" (Sewell 1996, 270) in the sense of capturing insights that should, under certain conditions, be applicable more broadly. This differentiation, in turn, facilitates the identification of other cases, if any, on which the argument could subsequently be tested.

6 The implied oversight of this caveat renders problematic the following methodological advice by Bates et al. (1998, 16): "The authors derive [testable hypotheses] from theory; but when the case materials do not confirm their expectations, they do not respond by rejecting their models. Rather, they respond by reformulating them and by altering the way in which they think about the problem."

7 This is not to say that historical works that do not use models cannot be very insightful. Barrington Moore's (1996) classic, Social Origins of Dictatorship and Democracy, for instance, presents an argument that is so highly contextualized that Victoria Bonnell (1980, 170) finds that "his generalizations...cannot be reduced to ... models." And yet, it has provided insights and inspiration to several strands of research on regime change, class formation, and processes of social transformation. Similarly, the theoretical model remains largely implicit in Philip Nord's (1995) The Republican Moment. Yet its rich and vivid account of the transformation of Parisian civil society from the 1860s to the 1880s, focusing on the emergence of democratic cultures and norms of conflict resolution in autonomous spheres of civil society prior to the successful political democratization of 1871, is surely very insightful for theorists and practioners of democratization

&lt;sup>5</sup> For instance, in a paper on popular support for European Union membership in the 1994 Austrian referendum (Büthe, Copelovitch, and Phelan 2002), we start deductively from general theories of European integration and political economy to model support as a function of, among other factors, the economic interests of industrial sectors. We then work inductively from a qualitative analysis of the public debate before the referendum to specify those industrial sectors whose interests had salience for the public and might therefore be expected to have affected the outcome of the referendum. We test the resulting specified model quantitatively, using referendum results from Austria's 121 districts as the dependent variable.

When success breeds success, when variables feed back into themselves, we have an exciting story to tell, but unless we know its metaphors [its model] . . . we have no way to tell it.

MODELS AND HISTORY: THE PROBLEM OF TEMPORALITY

Several scholars have suggested in recent works that the social scientific study of "history" raises particular methodological problems (e.g., Bates et al. 1998; Elster 2000; Lustick 1996; Pierson 2000). Yet none of them defines what he means by history, not even Terrence McDonald (1996b), in his programmatic essay, "What We Talk about When We Talk about History." So what is it that makes history distinctive?

Conceptualizing history as "what historians do" seems not very fruitful. Notwithstanding some real differences in stance and approach to evidence separating political scientists and political historians (Ingram 1997), what historians study is often studied with similar methods by political scientists, sociologists, economists, and others. Whether or not the study of history raises particular methodological problems for modeling or the presentation of empirical information would then become a matter of contested disciplinary conventions rather than of characteristics of the subject matter (Tilly 1990).

A conception of history as the study of "things of the past" is also not very promising. Studying past events may—but need not—require the researcher to work with sources that call for particular methodological, historiographic tools (McNeill 1998, 4f). Moreover, everything that we can study empirically must already have happened and, in that sense, is a "thing of the past." If "history" is distinctive, then it must be conceptualized as a set of phenomena with distinct characteristics.

I submit that history—as an object of study that may require a distinct approach to theorizing and to the presentation of empirical information-must consist of macroprocesses that cover an extensive temporal space. How does this definition raise particular methodological issues? If the process itself is our explanandum, then isolating events from the historical process within which they occur risks depriving us of understanding because any one event in such a temporal sequence, far from being an independent observation, is meaningful only if seen as part of the larger process (Elias [1937] 1997, 80ff, [1939] 1997, 390; Mink [1966] 1987, 64f, 67, 80, 82f). Temporality thus becomes the defining characteristic of "historical" explananda. There are, to be sure, several ways of conceptualizing temporality (Aminzade 1992; Griffin 1992; Sewell 1996), not least since time itself can be understood as a social construct; and the significance of the passing of time depends upon the level of abstraction at which we work.8 But whichever specific conception of temporality we adopt, it calls our attention to the issue of sequence, and it injects a dynamic element. Dynamics complicate the modeling task; sequence enables it.

Dynamics

The institutions within which actors interact are social constructs, as are the aggregate actors that populate so many of our models in political science. Due to factors such as uneven growth, increasing or diminishing marginal utility, and accumulation or ratcheting effects (e.g., Fearon 1998; Pierson 2000; Thelen 1999, 392ff) as well as the tendency of actors to attempt to manipulate or escape constraints (Almond and Genco 1977, 493, 518f), the passage of time makes it, ceteris paribus, more likely that institutions, actors themselves, and their preferences may change. Recognizing this dynamic aspect of temporality does not mean that everything is constantly in flux. In fact, institutions and aggregate actors can be extremely stable for a long period of time (Sewell 1996, 264). But the possibility of change implies that explanations of temporally large processes must allow for change in the constitution of actors (e.g., Ertman 1997; Spruyt 1994; Tilly 1998, 7ff) as well as for change in their preferences. In the sense of the inherent dynamism of temporality, then, history is "the study of changes of things that change" (Herbert Butterfield, as quoted in Schroeder 1997, 67). Models of "history" must explain stability rather than assume it.9

Because changes in preferences are all too easily invoked to explain changes in behavior and to claim the unsuitability of models that hold preferences constant, it is important to specify what I mean by preferences. 10 I follow Jeffry Frieden in defining preferences as those interests of a given actor that determine how the actor rank-orders the possible outcomes (1999, 42). Preferences thus must be differentiated from the actions that the actor may undertake to achieve any particular outcome ("strategies" in game theory parlance), but they should also be sufficiently specific to the situation that they can unambiguously yield a rank-ordering of the outcomes that would result from the conceivable actions in that situation. Consequently, "what are considered preferences in one [context] might be strategies in another" (Frieden 1999, 41).

A change in preferences becomes more likely over time for two reasons. First, new ideas arise over time. While Mark Blyth (1997) rightly warns against a facile attribution of causal force to ideas, ideas can indeed Hintze [1906] 1975; Tilly 1975, 1992) will surely differ from those that might be relevant when we are concerned with the decision-making process that leads to a particular policy decision.

9 This is one of the strengths of Barry Weingast's chapter in Analytic alike. I submit, however, that those insights would be clearer and more accessible if the authors had also presented an explicit theoretical model.

&lt;sup>8</sup> The conception and increments of time that are relevant when the process we want to explain is a vast sweep of state formation (e.g.,

Narratives: His model of U.S. federal institutions allows him to explain why policy remained stable over several decades despite major economic and demographic changes that significantly increased the numerical strength of groups opposed to the status quo and changed some of their preferences (Weingast 1998, esp. 161ff, 184f, 188).

10 I thank one of the anonymous reviewers for thoughtful suggestions cause a change in preferences by making altogether new outcomes available, which forces a reordering of the outcomes. The rise of Keynesianism provides an illustration of this phenomenon. At the outset of the Great Depression, certain social actors failed to rank first among their preferences a Keynesian demand-side stimulus policy and failed to influence policymakers accordingly, even though with hindsight the adoption of such a policy would have been the outcome that maximized their material utility. Later, similarly situated actors indeed preferred such a policy over alternatives and employed various strategies to achieve the adoption of Keynesian policies by governments. This finding does not suggest that, at the earlier point in time, the actors were less instrumentally rational in ranking the outcomes and selecting their strategies accordinglythe "outcome" of Keynesianism just had not been formulated yet (Hall 1989).

Second, ideas and especially norms, being social constructs, can change (Ball, Farr, and Hanson 1989; Ruggie 1983; Wendt 1999, esp. 113ff). An example from the literature on regime change illustrates the resulting change in preferences nicely: Assume that policies are at least in part a function of regime type, and assume further that regime type has no effects on the citizens other than through policy (there are no normative commitments to a particular regime type). Social actors (individuals or groups) may, under these conditions, be expected to have preferences over (i.e., rank-order) the regime types based on which regime type affords them the greatest impact on policy (e.g., Bracher [1955] 1971; Hallgarten 1952; Lepsius 1978; Przeworski 1991, passim, esp. 51ff). If actors now develop over time a normative commitment to a democratic form of government, they will probably rank-order the possible outcomes of a regime change differently because the utility that they assign to the outcome "democracy" has increased relative to all other outcomes (e.g., Bermeo 1992; Di Palma 1990; Weingast 1997). The actors may still rank-order their strategies as before and may therefore choose the same action (for instance, acquiescence to the rule of the current nondemocratic regime if the perceived risks and costs associated with doing anything else render other possible strategies prohibitive), but their preferences have changed.<sup>11</sup>

The dynamic quality of temporality suggests that models based on assumptions of stable institutional contexts, stable preferences, and constant units for which we record variable, independent attributes at any given point in time would be unsuited if we are concerned with explaining history, understood as a macroprocess. Yet taking temporality seriously does not require abandoning modeling as such. In fact, standard game theoretic models can incorporate dynamic elements (for an introduction, see Brams 1994, and Gibbons 1992, 55ff, 173ff), and the extensive form used to depict and analyze such dynamic games indeed "take[s] sequence into account" (Bates et al. 1998, 14)—although it is based on a truncated conception of temporality in that, within such game models, "actual chronology is important only insofar as it influences what one player knows about the actions of the second" (Kreps 1990, 18). Models of historical processes, in contrast, need to derive the constitution of the actors and explanatory variables such as actors' preferences within the model in order to allow for change (cf., e.g., Jackson and Nexon 1999, 302ff). At the same time, such endogenization of explanatory variables to capture dynamic change (and explain stasis where it occurs) does not require a fundamentally different approach to theorizing. Some recent work in economics, for instance, relies on only minor modifications of rational choice assumptions to develop dynamic models of preference formation (e.g., Becker 1996), which could be used as a building block of a larger model of an historical process. Evolutionary models developed in biology seem to be well suited to being adapted to explain the sociopolitical processes of persistence and change in the knowledge, values, and habits to which we customarily refer as "culture" (Boyd and Richerson 1985). In sum, endogenizing explanatory variables does not require a fundamentally new approach but can be achieved through building on, or adapting, various existing types of models.

Endogenizing explanatory variables, however, comes at the expense of parsimony or worse: Scholars who seek causal explanations usually frown upon endogenization because when the dependent variable is not only explained by, but also (partly) explains the independent variables, we run the risk of circular reasoning. Can we avoid this problem? Sequence provides the answer.

Sequence

Sequence allows us to endogenize the explanatory variables without having to abandon modeling and scientific aspirations because it enables us to avoid circular reasoning. Endogenization involves incorporating into the model some variation of causal feedback loops from the explanandum to the explanatory variables. In a static model, such feedback loops make the argument circular. Determining causality then becomes impossible. The sequential element of temporality, however, gets us around this problem, because it allows us to have causal feedback loops from the explanandum at one point in time to the explanatory variables at a later point in time only.<sup>12</sup>

The enabling effect of sequence is nicely illustrated by an example of a causal feedback loop in the chapter on education in Abram de Swaan's (1988) In Care of the State, where the author seeks to explain the historical process by which elementary education, once seen

Higher-level preferences surely remain the same (in this case, for instance, the preference for longer life or safer possessions, which may be threatened by the current regime's sanctions against prodemocracy activists). But—and this is the key to the differentiation between preferences and strategies used here—those unchanging higher-level preferences are insufficient by themselves to explain the rank-ordering of outcomes in the situation at hand.

as an individual and local responsibility, came to be provided through nationwide collective and compulsory arrangements, administered or at least regulated by the state. In de Swaan's model, an initial, partial success in increasing the scope and raising the quality of public education increases the opportunities for cross-regional commercial activities and the effectiveness of the state bureaucracies by raising the uniformity of language and knowledge. Over time, both of these consequences of increased and improved education should be expected to swell the ranks of the "metropolitan elites" (supraregionally trading entrepreneurs and central state bureaucrats) who favor the provision of elementary education as a public good. A change in the explanandum, education, thus leads to a change in the relative power of the actors in the conflict over the scope and quality of education at a later stage. It strengthens the proponents of widened and improved elementary education at the expense of the opponents, such as local elites and clergy, and in turn should lead to a further increase in the scope and quality of education.

Time itself thus becomes an element of the causal explanation, a factor in the model. But time does not function as a standard explanatory variable that directly affects the explanandum—otherwise, its effect could easily be expressed through a linear differential equation (McCloskey 1991, 22ff). Rather, it operates in the background to affect several explanatory variables in a variety of ways. Models that seek to help us explain historical processes qua processes therefore must explicitly incorporate a temporal dimension and consider carefully how each explanatory factor is affected by the passage of time in the process that we are trying to explain.

In sum, the importance of temporality is the distinctive characteristic of "historical" phenomena as objects of study, which raises particular methodological issues. The dynamic element of temporality complicates the modeling task by demanding that our models allow for the possibility of change (and hence explain rather than assume stability), but the incorporation of a sequential element enables us to do this without running the risk of the circular reasoning often associated with endogenizing the independent variables. Yet temporality raises additional problems when we move to empirical testing.

Model building is important for working out the internal logic of a chosen set of assumptions and relationships. But rigorous empirical analysis is needed to ensure the relevance of those assumptions and relationships.

CONFRONTING MODELS WITH DATA: HISTORICAL NARRATIVES

Ways of confronting a model with data range from showing the consistency of the theoretical argument with one empirical observation of the explanandum (Eckstein's [1975, 108ff] "plausibility probe") to a test on a large sample that meets the criteria of statistical analysis (irrespective of whether we employ a quantitative or qualitative methodology). Where on this continuum a given work falls does not affect its usefulness or insightfulness but should affect our confidence in its conclusion, keeping in mind that any single work usually exists in the context of larger theoretical and empirical literatures. At any given point along the continuum, multiple analytical techniques are at our disposal. From the viewpoint of the presentation of empirical information, we can differentiate broadly between a primarily quantitative presentation, based on statistical analysis, and narratives, based on qualitative techniques such as process-tracing. In this section, I spell out what makes narratives a particularly suitable form of presenting empirical information when we want to test models about historical processes, and I suggest ways of structuring narratives to attain this

Why narratives? Practical constraints, such as too few instances of a given macrohistorical process, may inhibit the use of statistical techniques. Yet time series analysts have long used lagged variables, and in recent years some scholars have begun to develop more sophisticated procedures to control for time dependence in political phenomena (Beck and Katz 1996; Beck, Katz, and Tucker 1998). In short, we have very suitable statistical tools for the empirical analysis of models with dynamic and sequential elements, although if the nature of the explanandum indeed is such that all stages within each instance of the historical process (the explanandum) are interrelated, one would need to incorporate into the statistical model a lag for each variable at each stage of the process prior to the final stage, with a corresponding rapid decrease in the degrees of freedom.<sup>13</sup> Moreover, various elements of the model and additional implications may be separately tested using statistical techniques. Statistical methods can thus be used in the empirical analysis of historical processes and may be particularly valuable when complementing and reinforcing insights gained from qualitative techniques (cf. Beck, Katz, and Tucker 1998; Berg-Schlosser and Quenter 1996; Mahoney 1999).

A preference for narratives, then, is due not to the unavailability of analytical techniques that lead to other forms of presenting our results, but to particular strengths of the narrative form. The most important of these strengths is that narratives, in addition to presenting information about correlations at every step of the causal process, can contextualize these steps in ways that make the entire process visible rather than leaving it fragmented into analytical stages. Moreover, narratives allow for the incorporation of nuanced detail and sensitivity to unique events, which may be necessary to understand the particular manifestation of an element of the model but which are beyond the model.

<sup>13</sup> The problem here is neither a lack of information, since information about the pertinent variables at each stage of the process is equally required for qualitative-narrative techniques such as process-tracing, nor quantification per se, which, at least at the basic level of more versus less, is usually possible. Collaborative database projects show that such complex information can be gathered for many cases. All of these techniques of course require carefully specifying the functional equivalents across different instances of the process.

In de Swaan's narrative of the introduction of state-provided education in The Netherlands, for instance, he notes how the Napoleonic invasion made the central metropolitan elite suddenly exceptionally independent of local elites and clergy, thus strengthening them in the societal group conflict over the expansion of the state, including the expansion of public education. This unique event affected the speed of change and thus the particular manifestation of the process, but it did not change the general dynamic of the process as captured by the model.

At the same time, narratives must not revert to untheorized historical accounts, invoking extraneous factors in an ad hoc fashion, because such accounts are not useful as a test of the causal propositions. How can we avoid this problem? The model itself can help us write narratives that are useful as a test of the argument.

The theoretical model can be used to structure the narratives. As we know from Arthur Danto's (1965. 149ff) thought experiments, even the imagined "ideal chronicler" who records every action and event in perfect chronological order cannot provide a complete history, let alone a causal explanation. Any historical narrative therefore must simplify "reality" by designating some elements as salient and omitting many more as not significant (McClelland 1975, 75ff). The model can help by providing the criteria for what is salient: The actors identified in the model constitute the actors of the narrative, which traces their goals, beliefs, and actions. Within each narrative we thus employ processtracing (Bennett 1999; George and McKeown 1985). The influence of other elements of the model, such as how temporal progression affects the actors and their preferences, should be systematically described. 14 Beyond the elements identified in the model, however, additional context-specific information should be minimized. Information that is extraneous to the model should be provided only insofar as it affects salient elements and is needed either to understand the relationship between these elements or to appreciate the contingencies of a particular historical process. If the narrative cannot be written in terms of the model, something is wrong with the model.

Using the model in this way to discipline the narrative ensures equivalence in the sense that each narrative contains the same (or at least functionally equivalent) elements. Each narrative thus becomes a unit or "observation"—a "plausibility probe" to test the causal argument, though we may not be able to assume independence for testing purposes (Sewell 1996, 258f). And most importantly, the model allows the analyst to overcome the problem of deciding what matters for the narrative (cf. Mink [1978] 1987, 187f)—the problem that leads to the ad hoc-ness of many inductive historical explanations.

HISTORICAL NARRATIVES AS DATA: FOUR PROBLEMS AND (PARTIAL) SOLUTIONS

Notwithstanding the above strengths of narratives, their use as data brings to light four problems and limitations not identified in recent methodological work and debates on history, narratives, and social science theory. The first two problems are particular to the use of narratives as data in conjunction with models of historical processes; the third and fourth apply to any use of narratives as data.

The first problem concerns defining or delineating historical sequences as distinct, or what Bearman, Faris, and Moody call "casing" (1999; see also Mink [1966] 1987). If we conceive of history as a continuous stream of interrelated events, then at the logical extreme there is no beginning and no end. A narrative, however, inherently imposes a beginning and end onto the historical record. To be sure, all empirical work—whether large-N statistical or small-N case study work—needs to justify the boundaries of its units of analysis, especially when proceeding on the assumption of independence of observations (cf. King, Keohane, and Verba 1994, 222). But the emphasis on the interrelatedness of events across time makes this problem particularly acute for the empirical testing of models of history, while the literary and "aesthetic" (Topolsky 1998) qualities of the narrative tend to obscure it.

The model can provide a deductive, albeit only partial, solution to this problem. By specifying the explanandum in general terms and theorizing temporality explicitly, the model delineates a sequence as distinctbased on our research objectives—in the potentially infinite space of time. Note, however, that the explanandum itself provides a justification for choosing the starting and ending points of the narrative only insofar as the historical process we seek to explain can plausibly be said to have had a clear starting point (e.g., an exogenous shock) and to have "run its course." A number of sociologists have in recent years developed alternative inductive procedures, often grounded in the boundary specification approach of network theory, for delineating an event sequence as a distinct process and hence justifying a distinct narrative with clear end points: "event structure analysis" (Heise 1993), "abstraction and generalization of interactions" (Abell 1993), "interaction process analysis" (Kosaka 1993), and "bicomponent analysis" of event populations (Bearman, Faris, and Moody 1999). However, questions remain about the logic underpinning these procedures (see Abell et al. 1993), and I doubt their general applicability to macrosocial phenomena. This leaves us with a clear specification of the explanandum as the only generalizable, methodological justification

De Swaan (1988), whose use of historical narratives is exemplary, achieves such a delineation of a temporal sequence by defining his explanandum as the process by which elementary education was transformed from a private and local affair into a responsibility of the state, provided at a basic level throughout the territory within its reach, according to certain standards (e.g., a uniform language) and financed through compulsory measures. This definition of the explanandum suggests that the narrative must start with the initial moves (ideational or practical) away from the previous local and private system of schooling but need not be concerned with that system's prior history. And the narrative can end when uniform, state-financed elementary education has been established in the country in question, without needing to concern itself with the subsequent evolution of the educational system or other related aspects of the welfare state. The specification of the explanandum thus provides the criteria for choosing the beginning and end of the narrative.

The second problem concerns the need to "conclude" the narrative while the process may be ongoing, which restricts the "generality" of our conclusions (King, Keohane, and Verba 1994, 137). If we use feedback loops in our models, through which a change in the value of the dependent variable is hypothesized to change the value of some or all of the explanatory variables at a later point in time, time itself acquires an explanatory role (in interaction with the original explanatory variables). As long as only the explanatory variables, and not the explanandum itself, are affected by time in this way, truncating time by setting an end point for the narrative does not introduce the selection bias that is caused by truncating the range of the dependent variable (King, Keohane, and Verba 1994, 128ff). But more than with conventional independent variables, of which we may restrict the range, we have to be very careful about assuming consistent continuity of the relationship between the explanatory variables and the explanandum beyond the investigated period. When time itself becomes a factor in the model, as discussed above, we have to consider carefully how each explanatory factor is affected by the progression of the process that we are trying to explain. The extent to which we can expect the effect of time on the explanandum (through the other independent variables) to continue as observed during the time period covered by the narrative depends on the tenability, beyond this time period, of the assumptions that we had to make to model the effect of time. This limitation of historical narratives affects the confidence we can have in the generalizability of the insights we gain from them. The solution, however, lies not in modestly claiming that our conclusions cannot be generalized but, rather, in paying careful attention to temporality in both the model and the narratives and specifying the implications for generalization accordingly.17

Third, what is the status of any narrative's truth claim? As Mink ([1978] 1987, 199) put this "dilemma of the historical narrative":

... As historical it claims to represent, through its form, part of the real complexity of the past, but as narrative it is a product of imaginative construction, which cannot defend its claim to truth by any accepted procedure of argument or authentication.

The problem here, as Andrew Norman (1991, 131) points out, is not that "a discursive representation has a structure that that which it represents does not." There is no necessary link between discursive structure and misrepresentation. Moreover, some objective criteria for assessing a narrative's truth claim exist, such as the extent to which an author is able to provide from the historical record evidence that, after having been subjected to standard historiographic procedures, supports the author's "story." It is therefore hardly necessary to equate historians with novelists or fiction writers (Gaddis 1992/93, 56). Rather, the problem is that, because facts never speak for themselves (Lustick 1996), there is an interpretative element that cannot be evaluated from within the narrative without circular reasoning. To assess this aspect of the narrative, the reader will have to draw on knowledge from sources external to the narrative at hand; i.e., the reader will need to know something about the historical period in question from other sources—sources that themselves are bound to have narrative qualities. Consequently, it is more meaningful to endorse good narrative work as "plausible," "persuasive," or "compelling"—as seems to be the practice among historians—rather than "true" or "right," though we certainly may find some narrative work that is poor and even plain "wrong," such as when its interpretation is marred by logical inconsistencies or makes incorrect assertions about the chronology of events.

Moreover, that the truth claim of a narrative cannot be assessed from within the narrative itself also has important implications for the utility of narratives as data on which to test hypotheses derived from models. Presumably, no one will consciously publish a model with empirical information that directly contradicts it. Except for discarded alternative explanations (see below) and possible oversights, then, the vulnerability of the model to empirical disconfirmation is ultimately also external to the narrative.

However, the use of multiple narratives may increase our confidence that the model indeed captures the key dynamics of the process. Using multiple narratives is appropriate because models should be applicable to more than a single instance if they have the benefits

 $<sup>^{17}</sup>$  The applicability of a historical model by no means needs to end with the time period on which it was empirically tested. Otto Hintze of capturing what is generalizable. Having assured that each narrative contains the same elements, we can employ each narrative as a unit or "observation" to test the causal argument. To be sure, we are unlikely to be able to furnish sufficiently many historical narratives to perform statistical tests, and by virtue of treating each historical narrative as a self-contained unit so as to incorporate temporal progression into each "observation," we have to reject any attempt to make "many observations from few" (King, Keohane, and Verba 1994, 217ff). Moreover, there is the problem of independence.<sup>18</sup> As William Sewell and others point out, if separate historical instances of a process are treated like ideal-typical scientific experiments, such treatment assumes that they are independent of each other. This assumption is problematic because, unless there is a perfect informational separation between the instances, actors in one (later or perhaps contemporaneous) instance will have knowledge of the constitutive actions and the outcome of the other instance(s) (Sewell 1996, 258f). Such knowledge will violate the assumption of independence—for purposes of testing a model—only if it changes elements of the process as modeled (e.g., the preferences of actors), which is by no means a necessary, though a possible and indeed quite likely consequence of having knowledge of prior or other instances. <sup>19</sup> Where empirical analysis suggests such an effect, we therefore cannot rely upon the statistical logic of the traditional comparative method (Lijphart 1971). But as "plausibility probes" multiple narratives are very useful. Increasing the number of confirming narratives does not in any way "prove" the model (Mohr 1996, 118ff), but in light of the temptation of inductivist modifications of a given model, the ability of a model to withstand the difficult test of application to different occurrences of the explanandum without ad hoc alterations makes more plausible that it has captured the central, generalizable dynamics rather than unique elements of a particular case.

In fact, it is the use of multiple narratives that makes Theda Skocpol's (1979) States and Social Revolutions, Margaret Levi's (1998) "Conscription: The Price of Citizenship" (1998), and, especially, de Swaan's (1998, 52-117) "The Elementary Curriculum as a National Communication Code" so convincing. To be sure, the extensive methodological debate about Skocpol's book has produced "little consensus" about the status of her narratives (Mahoney 1999, 1156), and her consciously inductive approach makes it questionable to treat her narratives as data to test a model, but the book derives most of its persuasive power precisely from her ability to narrate three instances of social revolutions in the same terms. Multiple narratives work even more effectively in Levi's "Conscription." Though it is sometimes difficult to see how the various parts of her complex model structure the three narratives, each of her three accounts of the abolition of "buying one's way out of military service" (Levi 1998, 109), in France, the United States, and Prussia, shows the same, separately theorized process at work. Finally, de Swaan uses five separate narratives (for the United States, France, Britain, Germany, and The Netherlands) to test his—separately theorized though not fully explicit—model of the historical process by which elementary education becomes the domain of the state. In all of these works, what persuades the reader of the validity and usefulness of the model is that for each of the countries, as Sewell (1996, 262) puts it with respect to Skocpol, the specific historical process "can be narrated convincingly in terms of the operation of analogous causal processes, which...[thus] make sense of numerous details that otherwise would seem purely accidental." In this sense, providing multiple "plausibility probes," far from being "fruitless[ly] repetiti[ous]" (Skocpol and Somers 1980, 191), should enhance confidence in the explanation. This way of combining models with narratives allows us to provide a "scientific" causal explanation of historical processes, without depriving them of their process character.

Fourth, due to the limited truth claims of narratives, those who use historical narratives as empirical evidence for a causal explanation will probably fail to assess alternative explanations and, if they try, will fail to convince skeptics. Trying to assess alternative explanations would entail providing a second set of narratives. similarly structured by the underlying model of an alternative explanation for the same phenomenon. To be sure, such alternative narratives could conceivably be supplied by the same author just as those working quantitatively often operationalize and test alternative explanations. In fact, Graham Allison (1971) employed three separate narratives to test three alternative, competing models of foreign policymaking in Essence of Decision.<sup>20</sup> But alternative narratives by the same author serve primarily as a rhetorical device in support of the primary, favored explanation. The interpretative freedom of the author makes it unlikely that less convincing alternative narratives would be accepted as sound evidence of the failure of the alternative explanations. This, however, is not a serious problem. As Morris Fiorina notes, meaningful alternative explanations are much more likely to be advanced by others whose "perspectives and commitments" allow them to argue as strongly as possible in support of those alternatives. All such explanations must then be subjected to the collective assessment of the scholarly community at large (Fiorina 1995, 92).

CONCLUSION

I have pursued two objectives: (1) I have sought to clarify, based on a broad conception of modeling and an explicit definition of "history," the difficulties—and possibilities—of modeling historical processes; and

(2) I have sought to make the case for narratives, identify four overlooked problems with their use as data to test models about historical processes, and offer at least partial solutions to these problems.

I have argued that modeling is rendered more difficult when dealing with "history" due to the importance of the dynamic and sequential aspects of temporality for processes that can be methodologically meaningfully distinguished as "historical." But social scientists interested in the study of such "history" need not return to narratives that, detached from any explicit causal model of the historical process they seek to capture, implicitly make—often sweeping—causal claims based on hidden assumptions and unspecified causal mechanisms. There is no inherent incompatibility between the deductive modeling of causal relationships and the study of history. Quite to the contrary, for social scientists—and historians—who seek causal explanations of historical processes, making their models explicit and subjecting them to separate theoretical examination have several advantages. Most importantly, the greater transparency of a model (compared to a purely "operationalized" argument) facilitates the scrutiny of the argument's assumptions and internal logic, which is particularly desirable for inherently complex historical phenomena. Further, models help clarify what insights the author suggests to the reader, by inducing the author to specify which elements of the argument are, in the author's mind, uniquely specific to the historical setting and which parts of the argument are potentially generalizable. In fact, the model should be epistomologically prior to, and independent of, the narrative(s) used to "test" it, in order to enable the model—rather than the narrative—to do the explanatory work (cf. Somers 1996, 79ff).

Regarding the benefits of using narratives, I have emphasized the ability of narratives to contextualize any given stage in the process, which is essential when we seek to capture empirically the process for which the model stipulates an explanation. To be useful as a test of a deductively sound model, a narrative should be structured by the model in that the presentation of empirical information follows the model's identification of actors, their preferences, etc., so as to minimize the ad hoc character of the empirical account.

At the same time, using narratives as data to test a model that seeks to capture an entire historical process raises four problems not identified in recent debates. I have specified these problems and analyzed their implications for the usefulness of narratives as data. I have suggested ways of solving or minimizing the problems, including the use of multiple narratives to increase our confidence that the model indeed captures the key elements of a causal explanation of the processes that we are seeking to explain.

So does the study of history, understood as the analysis of processes that span a large temporal space, require a distinct approach to theorizing and to the presentation of empirical information? I conclude that it indeed engenders particular problems and requires us to be attentive to issues that may not arise in analyses of phenomena where temporality plays no role. But the study of history does not require a fundamentally different approach. Notwithstanding some remaining limitations, historical narratives can provide strong support for the plausibility of a historical model, maintaining a basic commitment to a scientific approach while overcoming several of the problems of the compatibility of historical narrative and social science identified by critics of the "protoscientific" ambitions of historical analyses. And it may be that at the level of broad historical phenomena, where the temporal dimension is crucially important to any explanation, providing such support for the plausibility of the argument is the best we can hope for, at least from any one scholar. Science is, after all, a collective enterprise (Weber [1919] 1946).

Does Liberal Democracy Presuppose a Cultural Nation? Four Arguments

ARASH ABIZADEH Wesleyan University

This paper subjects to critical analysis four common arguments in the sociopolitical theory literature supporting the cultural nationalist thesis that liberal democracy is viable only against the background of a single national public culture: the arguments that (1) social integration in a liberal democracy requires shared norms and beliefs (Schnapper); (2) the levels of trust that democratic politics requires can be attained only among conationals (Miller); (3) democratic deliberation requires communicational transparency, possible in turn only within a shared national public culture (Miller, Barry); and (4) the economic viability of specifically industrialized liberal democracies requires a single national culture (Gellner). I argue that all four arguments fail: At best, a shared cultural nation may reduce some of the costs liberal democratic societies must incur; at worst, cultural nationalist policies ironically undermine social integration. The failure of these cultural nationalist arguments clears the way for a normative theory of liberal democracy in multinational and postnational contexts.

he thesis that liberal democracy is viable only against the background of a single nation, understood in linguistic-cultural terms, has gained a conspicuous respectability recently. The thesis is advanced not only by social and political theorists,1 but also by advocates of Quebec's separation from Canada, by American antimulticulturalists who champion a strong national culture and identity, by those who oppose viewing Germany as a country of immigration, and by Euro-skeptics who argue that Europe is doomed to a perpetual democratic deficit because of the absence of a single national public culture.<sup>2</sup> In this paper, I critically examine four arguments purporting to justify, by appeal to the problem of integration, the cultural nationalist thesis. The key cultural nationalist claim is that the nation-particularly its shared cultural core-is necessary for effecting integration in liberal democratic societies and that the nation, culturally understood, is therefore necessary for well-functioning liberal democracy. I argue that all four arguments fail. My purpose in demonstrating this failure is to open the door for a theorization of liberal democracy in multinational and postnational contexts.

THE TWIN PROBLEMS OF MOTIVATION AND INTEGRATION: THE COMMUNITARIAN CRITIQUE

It is a commonplace in modern social theory that social integration, and the processes of cultural reproduction and socialization that it requires, cannot be explained solely by the empirical sanctions that structure strategic forms of action,3 i.e., purposive-rational social action that involves seeking the most efficient means to antecedently given ends. This commonplace enjoys at least a prima facie plausibility. First, and least controversially, neither cultural reproduction nor socialization, which must be invoked to explain the antecedently given ends of the social actor, can themselves be explained by sole appeal to the empirical sanctions that structure strategic action. This is because strategic action itself cannot, at a societal level, explain the antecedently given ends that such action presupposes as a motive in the first place. In the language of rational choice theory, strategic action cannot itself be the basis for a theory of preference formation. Second, both social and system integration require that social action be coordinated such that the actions x of some actors not systematically undermine the actions y of others whose performance is necessary for the performance of actions x by the original set of actors. (Social action is dependent on others' actions.) Coordinated strategic action thus requires institutional rules that structure the incentives for action in such a way that renders them mutually compatible. But strategic action itself cannot fully explain the provision of such institutions (Bates 1987; March and Olsen 1989). Furthermore, even if provision is assumed, in many contexts the empirical sanctions imposed by an institution are insufficient fully to explain its capacity for coordinating social action (Powell and DiMaggio 1991; Scott and Meyer 1994). In sum, strategic action cannot explain (i) the motivational content of social action as such, (ii) the provision of institutional forms that coordinate social action, and/or (iii) the full coordinating power of institutions. If social integration is to obtain, social actors must possess a motive to act such that their social actions are structurally compatible with each other. Strategic action can fully explain neither the requirement of motivational content (i) nor the requirements of institutional structure or form (ii, iii). The motivation for strategic action is straightforward: It is, by definition, the antecedently given ends of the actor. But if social integration requires nonstrategic action, then explaining at the macro sociopolitical level what accounts for social integration requires explaining, at the micro philosophical/ psychological level, the motivational basis for nonstrategic social action. I call these two related problems the twin problems of motivation and integration.

Political societies are often understood to have solved these twin problems via a shared affective identity that inspires its members' loyalty. Many writers have further maintained that motivating and integrating the polity's members have required appeal to shared ethnicity (i.e., myths of common descent), to provide an affective identity capable of motivating nonstrategic social action and serving as the (ostensibly) prepolitical basis for the polity's social integration (e.g., Smith 1986). But the problem for liberal democratic polities, of course, is that the racist overtones of ethnic nationalism sit uncomfortably with liberal democratic normative commitments (to say the least). The question is whether and how modern liberal democratic societies can solve the twin problems.

At the other end of the spectrum from the ethnic nationalist position, neo-Kantian liberals such as Jürgen Habermas argue that modern polities today can (and should) solve the twin problems by bypassing ethnicity and indeed nationality altogether. Motivating and integrating the democratic citizenry, Habermas (1989, 227, 1998, chaps. 4, 5) argues, no longer requires a basis in a shared national culture or history (much less a shared ethnicity); in an open, postconventional society, it is sufficient for political institutions to be subjected to the scrutiny of reflexive discursive practices that grant them presumptive validity in the eyes of those subject to them. What is required is a "constitutional patriotism," through which the citizenry identify with their polity thanks to what they take to be the rationally defensible principles its institutions embody.<sup>5</sup> As Ingram (1996, 2) puts it, "The idea of a post-national identity is of a political identity founded on recognition of democratic values and human rights as these are contextualized in a particular constitutional tradition."

But even communitarian critics who reject the ethnic nationalist position have argued that neo-Kantian liberals fail to identify an object of collective attachment strong enough to motivate the affects and, thus, fail to solve the twin problems of motivation and integration. The charge is that neo-Kantian liberalism does not place enough emphasis on the affective bases of democratic politics required to motivate adequately the democratic citizenry, which are to be found in such emotive virtues as community, loyalty, and/or a shared cultured life or history. For these critics, if values such as democracy and freedom are to be sufficiently realized, citizens must be situated within an affective or cultural horizon they could realistically call their own. While the ethnic nationalist answer is too thick, neo-Kantian constitutional patriotism is too thin: The fact that we find the principles embodied by political institutions rationally defensible is simply not enough to ground our identification with them in the sense required.6

If liberal democratic theory can be thought of as an attempt to reconcile freedom and political rule by ensuring that politics respect the basic requirements of justice and be legitimated via consent, communitarians argue that both justice (and particularly distributive justice) and democratic legitimation presuppose a thicker sort of shared affective community and/or identity. Two types of argument are offered in favor of this thesis, and, importantly, both rely partly on the imputation of the motivation problem to their neo-Kantian targets. One argument operates at the level of moral/political philosophy; the other, at the level of social theory. In other words, the two types of argument correspond to the twin problems of motivation and integration: at the level of the motivational force of practical reason and at the sociopolitical level of integration.

The philosophical arguments often take one of two related forms. The first appeals to an intuition some hold that the content of morality is such that significant moral obligations (e.g., those of distributive justice) obtain between individuals only to the extent that they share social relations. The specifically communitarian claim is that the social relations must constitute a community in a strong sense (e.g., not reducible to a contractarian scheme of social cooperation). So one of Sandel's (1982, 77ff.) major criticisms of A Theory of Justice was that Rawls's difference principle, which treats people's talents, powers, and resources as collective assets undeserved by individuals, necessarily presupposes a community (whose collective assets they are) with which individuals identify in a suitably strong sense, and which is prior to any contractarian account of social cooperation (cf. Taylor 1995, 184). The second, related philosophical argument banks on the claim that morality has an irreducible moment of partialism, i.e., that strictly impartialist moral theories cannot account for all of our moral duties or obligations. By partialism I mean a theory that holds that sometimes the fact that someone can be characterized as "mine" (my child, my coreligionist, my fellow national) provides an irreducible ground for special duties I owe to that person and not others (duties not dependent upon, for example, my consent).8 Communitarian partialism, then, would hold that I have special obligations to (the members of) my community, which I do not have to others-and that I must favor those members in (at least some) cases of a conflict of interest. One of the arguments in favor of partialism makes direct appeal to the motivation problem. David Miller (1995, 57-58) writes that what I'm calling impartialism (he calls it "ethical universalism") rests upon an implausible account of ethical motivation. When I act on moral principle, I am supposed to act simply out of a rational conviction.... I am not to be influenced by my sentiments.... But it seems unlikely that rational conviction can carry the weight required of it. (emphasis added)<sup>9</sup>

We can also find in Miller the second sort of argument, at the sociopolitical level, linking the concern with justice to that of motivation and democratic consent. Here Miller advances an empirical claim about social theory: we can only expect citizens to consent to institutions that redistribute resources according to, say, need, "if they regard themselves as bound to the beneficiaries by strong ties of community" (1989a, 59). For a just system of welfare to "be democratically supported," it must be "backed up by a popular consensus about the distributive principle in question," and this requires a "common identity" (1989b, 236-37). To "motivate people to make the sacrifices that social justice requires" is empirically more feasible when citizens "share a common identity or common values" (1998, 48, emphasis added). 10 (Note the equivocation.) Others emphasize that shared community and identity are relevant not just for mobilizing citizen support for programs of social justice, but for mobilizing democratic participation as such. Taylor (1996), for example, argues that free societies, relying as they must on the spontaneous support of their members, need the strong sense of allegiance that Montesquieu called vertu....[Democratic] participation requires not only a commitment to the common project, but also a special sense of bonding among the people." So both the philosophical and the sociopolitical sorts of argument made by communitarians ultimately appeal to the motivation problem, and to the role of affect and community in solving it.

Now, if what explains and motivates the nonstrategic action by which social integration is incurred is a shared affective identity, then the obvious question is where this common identity comes from, i.e., What are its sources, grounds, or preconditions? In other words, what requires explanation is the shared affective identity itself. As I understand it, the contemporary communitarian answers come in two forms; republican and nationalist. Both construe a shared affective identity as being in part constituted by the common sentiment/belief that "we" belong together. What I call (civic) republicanism denotes the view that the required object of affective loyalty that grounds this sentiment/ belief is a particular community with shared political institutions, territory, and (politicoinstitutional) history, i.e., a patria (e.g., Maurizio Viroli, Charles Taylor), while civic or territorial nationalism denotes the position that the relevant object of and ground for affect is a national community understood in terms of a shared culture with a territorial homeland but not necessarily a shared ethnicity (e.g., David Miller, Dominique Schnapper).<sup>11</sup> In the rest of this article, I take up this specifically (civic-territorial) nationalist version of the communitarian position. If ethnic forms of nationalism have proven to be ethically indefensible, these communitarians have accordingly sought to criticize neo-Kantian liberalism from an appropriately "liberal" nationalist perspective, one that presumably is capable of winning the hearts of liberal democratic citizens in a way that neo-Kantians and cosmopolitans cannot, while avoiding the pathologies of ethnic nationalism.

THE CULTURAL NATIONALIST THESIS

Consciously seeking to place himself in the tradition of liberal nationalism associated with such nineteenthcentury thinkers as John Stuart Mill, David Miller

It is not at all clear who actually subscribes to the view that Miller is attacking here. Not even Kant himself could be saddled with such a view: He thought that to act morally was to act out of respect for the moral law—respect being, of course, a feeling (Gefühl) (Kant 1996, 56, 201). For his defense of partialism see Miller (1988).

<sup>11</sup> To sum up, (1) ethnic nationalists appeal to the nation understood as a community of shared culture but also of common descent; (2) civic nationalists appeal to the nation understood as a community of shared culture with a territorial homeland, but not of shared descent; (3) civic republicans appeal to a patria understood as a community of shared political territory, institutions, and history, but not of shared national culture; (4) and neo-Kantians appeal to shared political institutions as such, which embody rationally defensible principles. I follow Kymlicka (1995) in assuming that both (1) ethnic and (2) civic-territorial nationalism are instances of cultural nationalism. (See also Nielsen 1996-97 and Brubaker 1998, 299.) I take communitarianism to refer to positions 2 and 3. It should be said that not everyone relates communitarianism and nationalism in this way. The French, for example, often understand communitarianism and nationalism to be two fundamentally opposed projects: Whereas the first term denotes loyalty to particularistic, subnational communities (what anglophones might call communalism), the second represents an attempt to transcend such particularisms by grafting citizens' loyalties to an overarching national identity. I follow anglophone usage here. For a classificatory scheme similar to mine, from which I have drawn, see Mason 1999, 2000. See also Keitner 1999 for a clear distinction between civic nationalism and constitutional patriotism.

embraces the thesis that liberal democracy presupposes the nation. The classic liberal nationalist thesis is that what motivates the citizenry to act beyond the domain of strategic action—what secures their integration—is an affective identity that stems from a shared national culture. We have already seen Miller's claim that the combination of social justice and democracy requires a shared community and identity. His further claim is that "this common identity must exist at the national level" (1989b, 237), that "the relevant communities are nations" (1989a, 68). The realization of "democracy and social justice... presupposes national communities in which mutual trust stems from a shared identity" (1998, 49).

Why is the nation the necessary matrix for liberal democracy? According to Miller, nations are necessary for solving the twin problems of motivation and integration, particularly at the level required by a democratic polity. On the one hand, nations are objects of affective attachment strong enough to inspire people to sacrifice on behalf of others and to participate in democratic politics. On the other hand, nations are of large enough scope to make distributive justice and democratic self-rule meaningful: "Although smaller-scale forms of community may provide the most intense experiences of solidarity, these communities will have little power to shape their environment" (1989b, 236).

Nations are the only possible form in which overall community can be realized in modern societies.... Without a common national identity, there is nothing to hold citizens together. (1989b, 245, emphasis added)

So, in modern states, a common nationality is a necessary condition for social integration: "Among large aggregates of people, only a common nationality can provide the sense of solidarity that makes this [good faith democratic deliberation] possible" (1995, 98, emphasis added).

But Miller's substantive cultural nationalist thesis is obscured by an ambiguity in his argument. In the face of empirical examples of multinational democratic states with important redistributive policies, such as Canada and Switzerland, Miller (1995, 96) is forced to argue that insofar as they do have such policies, "they work as they do because they are not simply multinational, but have cultivated common national identities."13 But here Miller is trading on an ambiguity between two senses of common nationality: (1) sharing a common culture constituted in part by common beliefs, a common language, etc., and (2) sharing a common identity constituted by shared sentiments or an affective sense of belonging and commitment. Officially, Miller stresses that two of the defining features of the nation, as he uses the word, are shared beliefs and a common public culture (1995, 22-25) and that what "holds nations together are beliefs" transmitted through a common culture (1995, 32). This is in fact his substantive thesis: that democracy presupposes a shared nationality understood in cultural terms. But when, confronted with cases such as Canada and Switzerland, he concludes that they each possess a shared nationality after all, here he means that Canadian citizens and Swiss citizens each have a shared affective identity: He cites John Stuart Mill approvingly, for "Mill was well aware that a common sentiment of nationality could coexist with linguistic and other cultural differences" (Miller 1995, 98, emphasis added).

The dilemma is that either Miller's argument must equivocate between these two senses of common nationality or it avoids being logically fallacious at the cost of being empirically undermined by cases such as Canada and Switzerland. To eliminate the equivocation, we must make explicit the connection Miller presupposes between the two senses of nationality. First, Miller assumes that the relevant motivational source of nonstrategic social action is affective, i.e., that solidarity in the sense of a shared, affective identity ("a common sentiment of nationality") is what motivates nonstrategic action and secures solidarity in the sense of social integration. 14 Second, Miller presumes that the source of this affective identity—i.e., the source of national sentiment, the basis for an identity capable of motivating nonstrategic action—is a distinct, shared national culture: "The fostering of national identity" requires "creating and maintaining a common public culture" (1988, 658). Thus democracy presupposes the nation, and the nation presupposes a shared public culture, "a public culture that is shared by all who belong to a particular nation... 'national character' must be interpreted in cultural terms—in terms of beliefs and attitudes, ritual observances, and so forth" (1989b, 244). (So the Swiss/Canadian cases pose a problem for Miller insofar as they are democracies lacking a single, overarching national public culture.)15

<sup>15</sup> It is significant that in discussing Canada and Switzerland, Miller (1995, 96) states that they have "common national identities" by virtue of certain kinds of shared political "institutions" and is silent on the requirement of a shared national public culture that he emphasizes throughout the rest of this book and his other writings. The fact that elsewhere he considers a shared culture necessary (and shared institutions insufficient) is what distinguishes his civic nationalist argument from republican or neo-Kantian ones (as I have defined them in footnote 11). Of course it might be argued that, despite appearances, Canadians or the Swiss in fact do share a national public culture, albeit of a "thin" kind. I do not pursue this empirical question here; but even if it were true that Canadians or the Swiss shared some sort of thin national public culture, this "thin" culture could not do the work that civic-territorial nationalists like Miller demand of it. First, to serve as the basis for social integration, they believe that the national culture must ground "a people with a distinct and common character of its own" (Miller 1995, 25, emphasis added). Whatever this putatively shared Canadian/Swiss national public culture is supposed to consists in, it is difficult to see how it could serve to distinguish the Canadian/Swiss "nation" from a host of other liberal democratic "nations." Second, this move completely deflates the concerns typically expressed by nationalists (including Miller) about a shared language, shared beliefs, shared rituals, etc. (e.g., Miller 1988, 657), and would thus, for example, fully undermine the motivation for Miller's (1998) Euro-skepticism.

I here formally state the cultural nationalist argument, which purports to identify a series of necessary conditions for social integration. The key cultural nationalist conclusion is Thesis 3b.

Thesis 0: The social integration, cultural reproduction, and socialization necessary for a well-ordered democratic society can be effected only if there exists a motivationally efficacious form of nonstrategic social action.

Thesis 1: The required motivation for nonstrategic social action obtains only if there exists a shared affective identity, constituted by the sentiment or affectively sanctioned belief that we belong together.

Thesis 2: This (motivationally efficacious) shared affective identity, constituted by the sentiment or affectively sanctioned belief that we belong together, can stem only from a shared, national, public culture.

Therefore.

Thesis 3a: The required motivation for nonstrategic social action can obtain only if there exists a shared, national, public culture.

and

Thesis 3b: The social integration, cultural reproduction, and socialization necessary for democratic society can be effected only if there exists a shared, national, public culture.

In logical form,

Thesis 0:  $s \rightarrow m$ . Thesis 1:  $m \rightarrow i$ . Thesis 2:  $i \rightarrow c$ .

Therefore,

Thesis 3a:  $m \rightarrow c$ .

and

Thesis 3b:  $s \rightarrow c$ .

where

s = the social integration, cultural reproduction, and socialization necessary for democratic society, m = the motivation for nonstrategic social action,

- i = a shared affective identity, constituted by the sentiment or affectively sanctioned belief that we belong together, and
- c = a shared, national, public culture.

">" stands for "only if." (One may, alternatively, interpret ">" to mean "implies," "requires," "can be explained only by," "finds a necessary cause in," or "finds its relevant source in.")

The reader should feel free to add the premises implicit to the argument (e.g., "under modern industrial conditions"). The formulation in terms of necessary conditions is designed to be agnostic among three interpretations: one that takes a necessary condition to be a necessary and preceding cause, one that takes it to be a necessary constituent, and one that takes it to be a necessary effect. Thus the claim about the necessity of the cultural nation to liberal democratic society need not be construed as a conceptual claim but can be (and most plausibly is) construed as an empirical causal claim.

The concluding cultural nationalist Theses 3a and 3b follow logically from the three premises; to attack the cultural nationalist position, one may call into question any of Theses 0, 1, and 2. Thesis 0 is the commonplace of modern social theory; having argued for its prima facie plausibility above, I take it for granted here. Thesis 1, which construes the required shared affective identity in terms of the common sentiment/belief that "we" belong together, is the shared communitarian thesis. Though I take both Thesis 1 and Thesis 2 to be problematic, the critical energies of this paper focus on Thesis 2, which distinguishes the nationalist from the republican position. In other words, I wish to demonstrate that even if we grant Theses 0 and 1, the nationalist arguments for 3a and 3b fail. This paper considers four such arguments: (1) the shared norms/beliefs argument, (2) the trust argument, (3) the transparency argument, and (4) the industrial society argument.

THE SHARED NORMS/BELIEFS ARGUMENT

The first argument can be found in the works of Dominique Schnapper. She says that if Italy is having trouble mobilizing projects of redistribution, it is because its "national solidarity is no longer founded on a common political project, stemming from a common political culture." Instead, whatever ostensible solidarity it continues to enjoy is "founded only on material interest" (1994, 193). (This is Thesis 3a, that nonstrategic motivation requires a shared national culture.) Citing Durkheim approvingly, Schnapper (1994, 40) argues that the process of internal integration implies... that the common goals of the collective enterprise be defined and accepted, that individuals share a certain number of common practices and beliefs, and that there exist interactions among the members of the group. In the case of the nation, it is a matter of political goals, practices, and beliefs, but these cannot be independent of social reality.

Speaking in the vocabulary of the "traditional sociological concept of socialization," and referring to "la capacité, socialement constituée, des hommes à acquérir par l'éducation—au sens large du terme—les moyens de participer à la vie commune," Schnapper (1994, 40) appeals to a process by which the individual, born in a particular society, internalizes its exigencies, acquires its common values, and adopts its norms of behavior by which the collectivity maintains itself.

This internalization of shared beliefs, values, and norms is crucial to the development of a common affective identity: The sense of belonging and national sentiment are born of this internalization of knowledge, of norms, and of common values... which indissolubly tie personal identity to a collective identity. Henceforth the individual finds the nation within his very being [Désormais l'individu trouve sa nation à l'intérieur de soi] [!] 16 (Schnapper 1994, 41).

It is no wonder that Schnapper hails the school system, which socializes and forms individuals, as a key instrument for national integration.17

So on Schnapper's account, the shared culture that integration requires (Thesis 3b) is one that includes common collective goals, common practices, common beliefs, and common norms and values, because a shared affective identity requires the internalization of these shared goals, beliefs, norms, and values. This internalization is what solves the twin problems of motivation and integration.

How plausible is Schnapper's argument? Not very. It is true that shared values or shared norms can be and often are one basis for a shared identity. But neither is a necessary condition, as a multitude of identities, whether Jewish, Québécois, Scottish, African-American, or Iranian, testifies. 18 What is the "norm," for instance, that all Jews, or even all Israeli Jews, share? As some of these examples further suggest, even affective identities that are presumed to be based on a shared culture do not require shared values or norms. 19

If the premise that shared affective identities require shared beliefs is true, it is true only in the constitutive but trivial sense that part of what it means to have a shared collective identity is to believe that the members of that collectivity in some sense belong together. But this shared belief is not a precondition for shared identity in any causal sense; it is simply the subjective component that is constitutive of collective identities. But it does not follow that other shared beliefs, say about the world or even about the specific nature or history of the identity in question, are necessary for there to be such an affective identity. In other words, either Schnapper's thesis that shared identity requires shared beliefs is trivially because conceptually true or it is false. To think that shared identities and hence social integration require other sorts of shared belief ignores the fact that the coordination of social action does not require all actors to have the same interpretation of the (inter)actions in question. What coordinated social action requires is not actual consensus about the meaning of the practice, but compatibility in the weak sense that each actor's interpretation of a particular practice, and the individual actor's corresponding actions, be such that they can persist in the face of the actions of other individuals, who may or may not share the same interpretations. In the face of the hermeneutical indeterminacy of meaning, consensus is at once unfeasible and unnecessary. For example, many social theorists have thought that symbols are an important facet of affective collective identity. But symbols' capacity to help affectively bind individuals together is neither conceptually nor empirically dependent on those individuals' consensus about the meaning of the symbol. A flag might symbolize the country's military victories for one citizen, their Olympic glories for another, the federation of the country's constituent regions for another, and the country's tradition of humanitarianism and peacekeeping for another, yet still help bind them all together (military buff, sports fan, federalist, and peacenik) in flag-waving pride. Indeed, one reason symbols can be such an important facet of unity at the level of practice is precisely the indeterminacy of their meaning.

It may be retorted that the beliefs that must be shared are of the following sort: For an electoral system or market to function properly, for example, the actors must share the belief that it is wrong to kill each other when a vote or transaction turns out to have gone badly for one party. This is true. But if this is what is meant by shared beliefs, then the nationalist argument gets the underlying intuition backward. This gloss on the nationalist thesis is that a shared belief qua constituent part of a culture is a necessary condition for (causally explaining) a shared affective identity. But the intuition at work here is that when you share an affective identity x, you will be motivated to believe that it is wrong to kill your fellow x-members and, accordingly, to refrain from carrying out such killings, even if it were strategically to your advantage to do so. In other words, the intuition here supports something like Thesis 1, which I have taken for granted, and not Thesis 2, which the retort purports to be justifying.20

THE TRUST ARGUMENT

Miller's own argument—the trust argument—slightly complicates the steps leading to Thesis 3a. (It initially attempts to establish its conclusions without resort to Thesis 2.) According to Miller, a well-functioning democracy needs its citizens to have some level of trust for each other. Social integration, to be fully democratic, requires citizens who not only fulfill their legal be a moment for pause.

17 Compare Schnapper 2000, 154–56. It is in part for this reason that Miller (1995, 143) approves of France's aggressive assimilationist cultural policies—it is a functional imperative for democracy to forge a common national qua cultural identity.

obligations and enjoy liberal rights and freedoms, but also are active citizens voluntarily motivated to deliberate about the common good and to make sacrifices for it. (Miller calls this a "republican" conception of citizenship [1999].) But to secure "the voluntary cooperation of citizens...each person must be confident that the others will generally comply—and this involves mutual trust" (1995, 91).21 And "ties of community are an important source of such trust between individuals who are not personally known to one another" (1995, 92). Miller adds that democracy understood as a deliberative mode of political decision making requires trust because only then would people "be willing to moderate [their] own demands in order to reach a compromise," and "Trust of this kind is much more likely to exist among people who share a common national identity, speak a common language, and have overlapping cultural values" (1998, 48). Miller (1995, 92) goes so far as to suggest that national community not only facilitates trust, but is, in modern states, a necessary condition for it:

In states lacking a common national identity...politics at best takes the form of group bargaining and compromise and at worst degenerates into a struggle for domination. Trust may exist within the groups, but not across them.

So according to Miller, one reason the democratic state (and fully democratic citizenship) presupposes a cultural nation is that a common national culture is the basis for trust between citizens, and trust is needed for citizens to act on bases other than narrow, strictly strategic considerations. Trust is not so much a positive source or motive for action, as it is a necessary condition for the removal of barriers to nonstrategic social action. So the trust argument for Thesis 1 (that nonstrategic action requires a shared affective identity) is that nonstrategic social action implies trust between the actors (Premise 1a), and trust in turn requires a shared affective identity (Premise 1b). Furthermore, a shared affective identity is not sufficient for trust; rather trust also requires (an identity grounded in) a shared culture (Premise 3a). Thus we may conclude that nonstrategic action requires a shared culture (Thesis 3a).22 Miller's argument echoes Barry's (1991, 174-75) argument that "co-operation on common projects" and "redistribution within the polity" are facilitated not only by "the of trust—at the very least, between what scholars commonly call "social trust" (in, e.g., institutions) and "interpersonal trust" (Rose-Ackerman 2001; cf. Sztompka 1999, chap. 3). I would wager that, given the choice, informed Iranian journalists accused of some crime would "trust" a German judge to grant them a fair trial far more than they would trust an Iranian judge, with whom they presumably share a common culture. Certainly, in debates about where to try Pinochet, there were many Chileans who "trusted" British and Spanish judges far more than they did Chilean judges. It is difficult to see a shared culture as the key explanatory variable, much less as a necessary condition, for social trust in institutions. Nor is shared culture necessary for interpersonal trust: We can all presumably think of cases in which consumers from a certain cultural ment to the interests of all those within the polity" (this is Thesis 1), but also by "trust in the willingness of others to reciprocate benefits when the need arises" (this is Premise 1<sup>a</sup>). Furthermore, according to Barry (1991, 177), "there is a strong causal link between cultural of, a common culture very persuasive. First, we need to be attentive to the distinction between different types

How plausible is the trust argument? I do not find the similarity and trust" (this is Premise 3<sup>a</sup>).

The counterexamples I have just given obviously trade on the intuition that trust consists in the belief that the other person or institution is trustworthy in general and will, thus, treat others with impartiality and fairness. Such belief in another's general trustworthiness may be better explained by the other's previous reputation for trustworthiness, rather than by the fact of a culture shared by the two parties.<sup>23</sup> group have "trusted" some class of merchants from a different cultural group far more than their own, because the "alien" merchants had a reputation for being trustworthy, while their "own" merchants were seen as scoundrels.

But this argument, it may be objected, misses the point. The sort of interpersonal trust that Miller is invoking is not a belief in the general trustworthy character of the other in treating others impartially, but a belief that she cares enough about me in particular to take my best interests to heart. She may be a scoundrel, but she would never betray the brother she loves. And what explains that fraternal affection is our common culture.

Two things have happened in this refinement of the trust argument. First, the trust argument is forced to establish Premise 3a by asserting Thesis 2 after all (that a shared culture is necessary for a shared affective identity). Second, the counterexamples I gave above still hold force against the rejoinder; they force the concession that a shared culture is not a necessary condition for trust (even granting Thesis 2). The claim now would have to be a general empirical one that a shared

In sum, the trust argument is as follows.

Premise 1a:  $m \rightarrow \text{trust.}$ Premise 1b: Trust  $\rightarrow i$ .

Therefore,

Thesis 1:  $m \rightarrow i$ .

Furthermore,

Premise 3a: Trust  $\rightarrow c$ .

Therefore,

Thesis 3a:  $m \rightarrow c$ .

culture is a fairly important explanatory variable for mutual (presumably interpersonal) trust. But what exactly would such a claim involve? Miller and Barry are using the term "trust" to refer to (a) a belief that one can reliably predict the actions of another, combined with (b) the prediction that the individual or group in question will treat one fairly, take one's best interests to heart, etc.<sup>24</sup> So to result in greater trust, a shared national culture would have to do two things: (a) foster a (belief in one's) capacity to predict the actions of others better and (b) result in others who are (or seem) more likely to treat one fairly (etc.). (It needs to do both because sometimes rendering another's actions more transparently predictable would make that person less trustworthy to me, insofar as it becomes apparent how untrustworthy or hostile to me that person really is.) Presumably the argument is that a shared national culture (a) enables prediction by facilitating transparent communication and mutual comprehension and (b) solicits fair treatment (etc.) by fostering a common affective bond of goodwill among conationals. But in that case, the trust argument is parasitic upon (a) what I call the transparency argument and upon (b) Thesis 2, which it asserts without argument. We need to know what the argument for Thesis 2 is.

THE TRANSPARENCY ARGUMENT

Let us first turn to the transparency argument, which purports to demonstrate in its own right that democracy necessitates the cultural nation. According to the transparency argument Miller (1998, 50) offers, a common national public culture, and particularly a common language, is a necessity for democratic deliberation, because otherwise there would not be a single, unified public: at best, there would be "separate bodies of public opinion that could then be fed into elite negotiations."<sup>25</sup> Again, Barry (1991, 178) had made this point as well: He argued in favor of "linguistic homogeneity" on the grounds that "for democratic politics to work, the citizens must be able to communicate with one another, and have access to the same forums of political debate." Schnapper (1994, 78) in turn argues that the "espace communicative et intersubjectif" that Habermas thinks democracy requires, in which "citizens, politicians, and experts can speak with, understand, and try to convince each other," cannot exist unless "all the members share a language, a certain culture, and at least a few common values."26 A common culture is needed to enable a transparent, unified public sphere of deliberation. And, in turn, this is necessary for democratic forms of social integration as Miller suggests, social integration might still occur without such deliberation in a unified public sphere, but it would not be consistent with fully democratic society and citizenship.<sup>27</sup>

While there is a kernel of truth to the transparency argument, it remains unconvincing as an argument about the necessary conditions for liberal democracy.<sup>28</sup> Such an argument tacitly draws much of its force from rather implausible views about what it means to "share" a culture. (1) One way to motivate this argument might be to assume that (a) insofar as a culture is "shared," it makes possible a realm of almost fully transparent mutual comprehension and communication within its boundaries<sup>29</sup> and that (b) democracy requires the unified, transparent public sphere thereby made possible. Be that as it may, the argument does presume that (2) there cannot be significant (i.e., politically relevant) mutual comprehension or communication beyond the boundaries of a shared culture. Thus, without a unified culture, there only would be "separate bodies of public opinion" (Miller), while democracy requires "access to the same forums of political debate" (Barry). This is a billiard ball view of culture—one that anthropologists have fully discredited—which takes particular cultures to be (mutually exclusive) "entities" whose boundaries are neatly specifiable and overwhelmingly impenetrable.30

It is true that difference may erect barriers to communication and mutual comprehension between individuals (Sommer 1999). This is the kernel of truth in the transparency argument. But such barriers of difference never fully correspond to a single specifiable collective boundary. Any attempt to specify the boundaries of a "shared" culture faces the insurmountable problem that further difference can always be found within the boundaries that were supposed to mark off difference, such that any cultural "entity" so specified will inevitably appear to the analyst to be a hybrid. It is,

Thesis 0:  $s \rightarrow m$ .

Premise  $0^a$ :  $m \to \text{transparent deliberation}$ .

i.e., one form of social action that must be motivated is transparent deliberation in a unified public sphere, if social integration is to be democratic.

Premise  $3^b$ : Transparent deliberation  $\rightarrow c$ .

Therefore,

Thesis 3a:  $m \rightarrow c$ .

and

Thesis 3b:  $s \rightarrow c$

 $^{28}$  Specifically, Premises  $0^a$  and  $3^b$  in the previous footnote are problematic.  $^{29}$  I doubt that thinkers such as Miller would actually endorse 1.a explicitly. The point is, rather, that the thesis in question derives some of its plausibility from an unexamined assumption such as this one.

30 As Handler (1994, 29) puts it, "The most significant development in culture theory of the past twenty years has been the attack on reifying and essentialist models of culture... Many scholars now agree that there is no unchanging "essence" or "character" to particular cultures; indeed, that cultures are not individualized entities existing as natural objects with neat temporal and spatial boundaries." See also Clifford's (1988) discussion (particularly at pp. 337–44).

prediction in the face of risk.

25 Miller is specifically raising doubts about European-wide democratic citizenship here.

moreover, impossible to specify fully the boundaries of a "shared" culture on wholly nonarbitrary grounds.<sup>31</sup>

Once we recognize that any attempt at boundarydrawing is always undermined by a remainder of difference, and that the final determination of those boundaries must rest on some arbitrarily fixed ground, then both assumption 1 and assumption 2 become problematic. Difference within the boundaries of a so-called shared culture undermines the assumption that (1.a) such a shared culture could realize the Rousseauist fantasy of fully transparent communication and comprehension. Full transparency to others, and perhaps even to oneself, is a chimera (Taylor 1992). Fortunately, democracy does not require, either in practice or in principle, (1.b) a single, fully unified, transparent public sphere. It is obvious that, in practice, well-ordered democracies function with multiple, crisscrossing, overlapping, public spheres (Fraser 1997). And in principle, even if one held the quasi-Rawlsian view that wellordered democracies necessarily rest upon a regulative principle that there be, at the most abstract level, a single, unified, transparent, overarching public sphere (one that corresponds to an overlapping consensus), it does not follow that citizens should have access to all the same "forums"—only that there be at least one overarching public sphere to which all had access. The requirement that all citizens have access to all forums would come close to Rousseau's banning of "partial associations." And even the view that there need be at least one overarching public sphere that holds, as it were, all the others together overlooks the possibility that instead there may be a whole network of overlapping public spheres, no single one of which spans the entire network, but all of which are either immediately or mediately linked through overlapping or porous boundaries.<sup>32</sup> Assumption 1 is by no means selfevident.

Assumption 2 either is false or collapses into solipsism: If mutual comprehension is possible, i.e., if some level of transparency is possible between human beings, then it must also be possible across cultures. This is because if the demarcation of culture boundaries is to some extent arbitrary, then wherever the boundaries are in fact drawn, it will remain the case that they could have, with reason, been drawn differently, such that some individuals who do not share a culture according to the first demarcation do so on the second, and vice versa. But either these individuals can attain some comprehension of each other or they cannot. If they can, then on the first way of demarcating the boundaries, there is cross-cultural understanding; if they cannot, then on the second way there is no comprehension between some members of the same culture. Since the culture boundaries could always be redrawn in such a way to divide any two individuals who on one account are united by a shared culture (by drawing the boundaries of culture according to the difference that exists between those two individuals), then it follows either that a shared culture is not necessary for mutual comprehension or that there cannot be any mutual comprehension between any two individuals, even if they share the same culture.<sup>33</sup>

But it might be retorted that this abstract philosophical discussion relies too heavily on "marginal" cases, in such a way that it leaves intact the general sociological point that transparency is significantly a function of something like a shared culture, particularly a shared language. After all, distinguishing between cultures is not wholly arbitrary, so that one may roughly but meaningfully speak of more or less transparency according to the degree of cultural "distance." So everything would hang on the political significance of the degree of communication possible. Miller's (1998, 50) concern, for instance, is that citizens who do not share a language cannot deliberate together, because their debates would be "opaque" to each other. But while this point seems to be straightforward common sense when we think of two individuals communicating at the face-to-face level-individuals who have needed to communicate face to face but who did not speak each other's language have often been responsible for creating pidgins—things are more complicated at the societal level. Democratic deliberation at a societal level is often mediated via the media, and multilingual media personnel can and do serve to bridge the communicational gaps at the societal level between individuals who do not speak the same language. So language is not an impermeable barrier at the societal level. (Translations, a frequent feature of multilingual democracies, are only one of many strategies people employ for coping with other languages. Another, of course, is becoming functionally multilingual: Why should we suppose that individuals are or must be monolingual?)3

However, even here Miller's point is not wholly without merit—witness the continuing resonance of describing Canadians as comprising "two solitudes," despite the presence of a bilingual telecommunications and political elite. So Miller's (1999) point might be that the demanding requirements of what he calls "republican" citizenship and deliberation rest on the greater transparency afforded by linguistic-cultural homogeneity. But we need to be clear about the baseline of comparison here. Miller's claim that without a common language there would be only "separate bodies of public opinion that could then be fed into elite negotiations" would resonate only if with a common language preface.

32 For a work that makes a similar point in relation to constitutional politics, see Tully 1995.

 $<sup>^{33}</sup>$  See Luban 1985, 241, for a more empirical argument that draws similar conclusions.

there could be a single, unified body of public opinion, which could also bypass elite mediation and directly determine legislation. Perhaps this might happen in some exceptional political moments—they are likely to be dependent upon some unique crisis, not upon a common language—but the suggestion, implicit to Miller's critique, that with a common language this would be the regular state of affairs is sheer Rousseauist fantasy—one whose possibility, it should be added, Rousseau himself gave us much reason to doubt (Saccamano 1992).

To sum up, we must conclude that, at the societal level, shared culture is neither necessary nor sufficient for mutual understanding. It may be true that greater cultural and especially linguistic distance between society's members may in some contexts necessitate greater effort and resources to achieve the same levels of communicational transparency, all other things equal. But all this would mean is that relative transparency might be attained more efficiently with a shared culture/language. So heterogeneity has its costs-which must be weighed against, among other things, the costs of imposing homogeneity. The thesis that a shared culture is a necessary condition for liberal democracy would be plausible only if it were the case that forgoing the costs of heterogeneity is absolutely indispensable to it. Why should we think this?

THE INDUSTRIAL SOCIETY ARGUMENT

Ernest Gellner offers an argument for the claim that cultural homogeneity's efficiency gains for communicational transparency are indispensable to modern, industrial liberal democracies. This is the fourth and final argument—call it the industrial society argument that I consider in support of the thesis that democracy requires the cultural nation, and this argument purports to provide a theoretical justification for the crucial Thesis 2. Gellner argues that modern industrial societies—and this would include industrial liberal democratic societies—objectively and functionally require a shared national culture.<sup>35</sup> The crux of Gellner's argument is that modern industrial societies, whose ultimate commitments are to economic growth, are dependent on innovation and hence on a "changing occupational structure" and "mobile division of labour." Furthermore, industrial economies are dependent on individuals who are capable of "sustained, frequent and precise communication" with strangers, in which meaning is "transmitted in a standard idiom and in writing when required." Thus there must be a societywide possibility of context-free, fairly transparent communication. This means that if members of this society are "to be properly employable and enjoy full and effective moral citizenship," they must possess a "level of literacy and technical competence, in a standardized medium, a common conceptual currency." Furthermore, the level of the standardized education required to instill this "is so high that it simply cannot be provided by the kin or local units.... It can only be provided by something resembling a modern 'national' education system" (Gellner 1983, 32–34; cf. Gellner 1996, 107).

Modern society is one in which no sub-community, below the size of one capable of sustaining an independent educational system, can any longer reproduce itself. The reproduction of fully socialized individuals itself becomes part of the division of labour, and is no longer performed by sub-communities for themselves. (Gellner 1983, 32)

Gellner (1983, 38; cf. 46) concludes that "cultural homogeneity" is a functional and hence objective systemic imperative faced by industrial societies:

It is not the case...that nationalism imposes homogeneity; it is rather that a homogeneity imposed by objective, inescapable imperative eventually appears on the surface in the form of nationalism.

Thus, according to Gellner, modern industrial liberal democracies objectively require a single national culture.<sup>36</sup> This is the basis for Gellner's adherence to Theses 0–3a. Gellner is working with a categorization of social action that is analogous to the strategic vs nonstrategic distinction I have employed, and he repeats the commonplace of social theory that strategic action is generally insufficient to explain social integration (Thesis 0):

Two generic agents or catalysts of group formation and maintenance are obviously crucial: will, voluntary adherence and identification, loyalty, solidarity, on the one hand; and fear, coercion, compulsion, on the other.... A few communities may be based exclusively or very predominantly on one or the other, but they must be rare. Most persisting groups are based on a mixture of loyalty and identification (on willed adherence), and of extraneous incentives, positive or negative, on hopes and fears. (Gellner 1983, 53, underlining added, italics in original)

While this passage only implicitly signals Gellner's commitment to Thesis 1,<sup>37</sup> his adherence to Thesis 2 and Thesis 3a is explicit:

When general social conditions make for standardized, homogeneous, centrally sustained high cultures, pervading entire populations and not just elite minorities, a situation arises in which [Thesis 2] well-defined educationally-sanctioned and unified cultures constitute very nearly the only kind of unit with which men willingly and often ardently identify.... In these conditions, [Thesis 3a] men will be politically united with all those, and only those, who share their culture. (Gellner 1983, 55)

What motivates social actors to act upon the basis of nonstrategic action ("will"), and so to effect integration ("be politically united"), is ultimately a shared culture, the only thing with which, in industrial societies, social actors affectively identify.

The key to Gellner's argument, and the point that I take to be most problematic, is the claim that homogeneity is an inescapable objective imperative of industrial society:

It is not the case that nationalism imposes homogeneity out of a wilful cultural Machtbedürfniss; it is an objective need for homogeneity which is reflected in nationalism...a modern industrial state can only function with a mobile, literate, culturally standardized, interchangeable population.... (Gellner 1983, 46, my emphasis)

To draw this conclusion, Gellner explicitly relies on Weber's notion of rationalization, which, according to Gellner (1983, 20) implies consistency (treating like cases alike) and efficiency (instrumental meansends rationality). Gellner's (1983, 21) thesis is that industrial society requires Weberian rationality, and Weberian rationality presupposes a "universal conceptual currency" provided by a shared culture. Part of the problem with Gellner's argument is that it is caught up in the old assumptions of modernization theory, whose exponents thought that the changes associated with modernity, such as technological advances, industrialization, urbanization, and, above all, the instrumental rationalization of economy and state bureaucracy, are detrimental to "traditional" cultural forms. Modernization represents, in this view, a sort of triumph of instrumental reason, a triumph whose progress required the overcoming of traditional, parochial cultural forms and the incorporation of all members of industrial society into a single overarching national culture (Hobsbawm 1992, 39). Only such an incorporation could make possible the instrumental efficiency gains required by the modern industrial market and the modern bureaucratic state.

But it is now recognized that those cultural forms that the old modernization theorists labeled "traditional" often flourish precisely because of modernization (Gusfield 1967).<sup>38</sup> Similarly, there is no reason to think that, even if industrial society requires an education system that trains its students in a set of common technical and communication skills, these competencies require a single culture or even language. Indeed, increases in the levels of education and communication in industrial societies may decrease the need for cultural homogeneity, because of an increase in people's skills in dealing with the new or unfamiliar—pace Gellner's assumption, the knowledge imparted by education is not simply a matter of some formulaic content that all must share, but of skills that may amount to an ability to recognize Wittgensteinian family resemblances.<sup>39</sup>

So even if we grant that, ceteris paribus, cultural homogeneity is the most efficient means to secure the requirements of industrial society,<sup>40</sup> it certainly does not follow that "nationalism as such is fated to prevail" (Gellner 1983, 47). Despite Gellner's own well-known antinationalist proclivities, his version of economic determinism—which is no more credible than the other economic determinisms that have historically preceded it—ironically verges on normative political philosophy masquerading in the guise of social theory:

We do not understand the range of options available to industrial society... but we understand some of its essential concomitants. The kind of cultural homogeneity demanded by nationalism is one of them, and we had better make our peace with it. (Gellner 1983, 39)

When Gellner says that we "had better" make our peace with it, does he mean that we "must" or that we "should"? It is not and never has been the case that we must accept maximum industrial economic growth just because we want some growth; industrial society does not collapse just because its efficiency goals are moderated or balanced by other, conflicting values. Cultural homogeneity may or may not be an "essential concomitant" for an industrial society committed to the maximum physically possible levels of economic growth irrespective of other values, but there is little evidence that industrial society as such requires such a commitment. So we should "make our peace" with nationalism only if we should accept maximum industrial economic growth as a value that trumps all others. But why should we do this? What recommends sheer capitulation to the systemic colonization of the lifeworld, to the thoroughgoing triumph of instrumental over practical reason? Even faced with the discipline imposed by a competitive global market, efficiency is never the only value that liberal democratic industrial societies must realize. When Gellner (1996, 105) says that "economic growth is the first principle of legitimacy of this kind of society," what he says may be true of Brazil's bureaucratic-authoritarian regime in the 1960s, but the governments of few liberal democratic societies could, in the name of economic growth or global competitiveness, commit the gross human rights violations the Brazilian regime so justified and leave their legitimacy intact. The bases of their legitimacy are rather more diverse. The burden of proof lies with the philosopher who wants to argue that the material goods of industrial society are the only constituents of the good life.

If it be objected that Gellner's point is that all of the goods of industrial democracies, material or not, are contingent upon a standardized education of large enough scope to sustain the economy, and that this standardized education wipes out localized cultures that cannot reproduce themselves because they lack access to the institutions of state education, then one might plausibly point out that while there may be a minimum size requirement, diverse cultural practices can be (re)produced via substate educational institutions. (In numerous countries, for instance, cultural diversity is in part reproduced by the fact that education is not under jurisdiction of the central government.) Viability need not require uniformity at the state level. It may be retorted that Gellner's point is simply that, given industrial conditions, those who resist cultural homogeneity at the state level will always be faced with nationalist demands to render the boundaries of politics coterminous with culture, i.e., that Gellner is simply explaining the sources of nationalism. (So not surprisingly, Canada has been hardest hit by Québécois nationalism, one of whose primary focuses has been the education system, precisely after Quebec industrialized.) But this rejoinder amounts to this: The struggle to accommodate cultural difference in modern industrial democracies is not a prisoner to an iron cage of cultural homogeneity; it is simply most likely to be confronted by nationalists who struggle against such accommodation, and whose political project of rendering the boundaries of politics congruent with those of culture ultimately draws much of its strength from (and is empirically explained by) the efficiency requirements of industrial societies. But who wins that struggle in a particular state is not a fait accompli. There is more hope for Gellner's antinationalist normative commitments than his own determinist social theory allows.

In other words, the so-called objective imperative to cultural homogeneity is hardly a scientific truth that enjoys what Gellner (1996, 111) tongue-in-cheek calls, with characteristic wit, "Euclidean cogency." Rather, it is a bit of nationalist ideology par excellence; Gellner is guilty of good old-fashioned reification in the Marxist-Lukácsian sense of the word. Such claims to provide an account of "objective" imperatives are highly suspect by virtue of the hermeneutical predicament faced by all social theory: All such theories are themselves part of the social phenomena they purport to explain. This implies that we cannot simply and solely appeal to the "empirical outcomes" in a positivist manner to settle questions about the "essential concomitants" of industrial liberal democracies, because the empirical outcomes themselves (which are the results of purposive, meaning-endowed actions) may turn out to depend upon certain beliefs about these "essential concomitants": Thus rather than the empirical outcomes telling us which social theory to believe, it may, on the contrary, be the case that the very fact that certain social theories are believed helps explain the empirical outcomes. This is not to say that empirical analysis is useless—quite the contrary. The point is simply that interpreting the empirical evidence is anything but straightforward, because the theories that purport to explain the social "facts" are themselves part of those facts. This phenomenon is exacerbated in the case of social-scientific theories of nationalism, because, as Handler (1988, 8) has argued, nationalist ideology and social science theory have been especially interpenetrated by each other. Nationalist beliefs about "imperatives" of homogeneity may turn out to be self-fulfilling.<sup>41</sup>

This becomes clearer once we specify for Gellner's theory—as we must, if his theory is not to lapse into teleology—the causal mechanisms by which a functional "need" for nationalism is supposed to result in nationalism. As Brendan O'Leary (1998, 52) puts it, "One obvious way to reconstruct Gellner's argument" to avoid the charge of teleological functionalism is to provide a filter explanation of the following form:

Modernising elites believe that nationalism is essential for modernisation, precisely because it breaks down barriers to modernising success. Nation-building nationalists recognise the beneficial consequences of nationalism, and this fact helps explains [sic] its political diffusion. (emphasis added)

But the hermeneutical predicament outlined above suggests that O'Leary takes too much for granted when he speaks of "recognition." First, as O'Leary himself would acknowledge, even if the fruits of industrial society were most efficiently won, all other things equal, via cultural homogeneity, usually all other things are not equal: There are serious social, economic, political, and other costs in trying to impose cultural homogeneity upon individuals who resist. (Witness the disasters of forced assimilation policies vis-à-vis Aboriginal populations in settler countries such as Australia, Canada, and the United States). Second, and most importantly, once we go beyond Gellner's reification and acknowledge, as O'Leary and others have urged, the political

42 Hall's (1998, 9) particularly nuanced formulation of the implication of O'Leary's argument is instructive: "The seeming necessity of the equation between social homogeneity and the modern world... is an ideology, and an ideology which may not be completely true: for all that modern social organisation may be easier given social similarity, policies to engineer social homogenisation forcibly may... have grave disadvantages."

nature of nationalism's genesis and/or diffusion,<sup>44</sup> we are naturally led to ask to what extent even the "beneficial consequences" of a homogeneous national culture are an antecedently given objective economic fact of the matter and to what extent they are a matter of sociopolitical contingency. O'Leary is too committed a nationalist to take this further step, but this is an empirical question: To what extent is believing cultural homogeneity to be essential to modernizing success simply a recognition of an antecedently given socioeconomic or systemic fact, and to what extent is this socioeconomic "fact" a product of widespread sociopolitical actions based on belief in this putative fact?<sup>45</sup>

We can get a better sense of this problem through some historical sensitivity. The thesis that industrial or liberal democratic society requires cultural homogeneity has an even more extreme ancestor: the thesis that integration, indeed social order and peace, in any society requires religious homogeneity. In the twentyfirst century the thesis seems rather absurd; but in the seventeenth century, it was the heartfelt belief of many an Englishman. The Arminian Bishops of the Church of England believed that uniformity in form and ceremonial was required; the Puritans in Parliament went further, arguing that society required uniformity of belief (Tanner 1971, 81). The various religious disputes and attempts at enforcing uniformity played a significant role in bringing about the Civil War, and if there were social scientists in seventeenth-century Britain, they may very well have concluded that social order does indeed (objectively) require religious homogeneity. In fact, one of the precursors to modern social science did conclude something to this effect. Despite the fact that Hobbes (1996, 479-80) implicitly embraced religious toleration in his endorsement of Independency, he also believed that ultimately any secure society requires a public consensus on the meanings of all words, and most pressingly, of moral and religious language. In other words, social order required that everyone in the realm publicly defer to the religious theology determined by the sovereign. But with hindsight, we might conclude that far from religious homogeneity being an objective requirement for social order, it is the belief in that thesis and the concomitant attempts at enforcing homogeneity that pose the threat to social order. We can discern Hobbes's (1996, 471) own tacit recognition of this in his attempts to endorse toleration and freedom of conscience as a means to calm the religious zealotry that sought to impose a homogeneity of belief merely a few degrees thicker than that deemed necessary by nationalists such as Schnapper. The point was explicitly recognized by Locke in his Letter Concerning Toleration. 46

So perhaps the empirical trouble faced by culturally heterogeneous liberal democratic societies is explained not by heterogeneity perse, but by the fact that there are too many nationalists running around crying out, "Objective imperative!" At most, Gellner's theory shows that it is an objective imperative that there will always be such folks in industrial societies, but not that the rest of us should believe them. If there is a Euclidean cogency to Gellner's theory, it is that it predicts the very fact of its own existence.

CONCLUSION

I have argued that, even if we grant (Thesis 0) that social integration requires nonstrategic action and (Thesis 1) that the requisite nonstrategic action necessarily depends upon a shared affective identity, it does not follow (Theses 3a and 3b) that the nonstrategic action indispensable to social integration requires a shared national public culture. Four of the most common arguments for the cultural nationalist conclusions fail. People can affectively identify with each other despite not sharing particular norms or beliefs; the trust indispensable to social integration is not dependent upon shared national culture; national-cultural diversity may raise the costs of, but does not rule out, achieving higher degrees of communicative transparency; and the higher economic costs of national-cultural diversity, even if not fully balanced by diversity's economic benefits, do not render homogeneity an "objective imperative" for industrial liberal democracies.

Moreover, there is also reason to be skeptical of Thesis 1, which construes a shared affective identity in terms of a common sentiment/belief that "we" belong together. We might, for instance, follow Andrew Mason and distinguish between two kinds of shared identity. The first depends upon "a sense of belonging together," where people "believe that there is some special reason why they should associate together, such as that which might be provided by the belief that they have a common history or distinctive culture." The second involves "a sense of belonging to a polity," which obtains if and only if a person "identifies with most of [the polity's] major institutions and some of its central practices, and feels at home in them." Mason (2000, 127-29; see chap. 5 as a whole) then goes on to argue that "the citizens of a state might in principle have a sense of belonging to their polity without thinking that there is any real sense in which they belong together" and that a shared identity based on a sense of belonging to the same polity may be sufficient to buttress liberal democratic practices. So Thesis 1's construal of &lt;sup>46</sup> See Locke (1983, 52), where he argues that instead of religious diversity being a threat to the social order, social order is threatened by religious persecution that is motivated by the fear that religious diversity is a threat to social order. The persecution itself is the threat to social order, and makes its premise (that religious homogeneity is required for social order) true, since the persecution causes individuals to mobilize against the state on the basis of their religious differences.

a shared affective identity in terms of "a sense of belonging together" may be unduly restrictive. Even if social integration requires a shared affective identity, that identity might center upon a shared set of political institutions—and citizens may affectively identify with their polity (and, by extension, its citizens) for different reasons.47

These are only suggestions; it is not my intention here to provide a full-blown theory of liberal democracy. Rather, my purpose in demonstrating the inadequacy of the cultural nationalist answer to the twin problems of motivation and integration has been to open up the possibility and demonstrate the need for a normative theory of liberal democracy in multinational and postnational contexts. My argument suggests, for instance, that Europe's democratic deficit is not the inevitable concomitant of national heterogeneity: Euro-skeptics are mistaken to think that cultural nationalism provides their skepticism with liberal democratic credentials. The argument here also suggests that integration in liberal democracies is not contingent upon cultural nationalist assimilation policies. To the contrary, faced with cultural heterogeneity, state-sponsored nationalist projects of cultural assimilation, speciously justified by reference to some supposed need for homogeneity, have increasingly proven to be not just ineffective, but positively counterproductive to the goal of integration. Thus, ironically, the hard-nosed French republican version of cultural nationalism, which tirelessly presents itself as the solution to France's continuing anxieties over its failure to integrate fully its citizens of North African origin, is perhaps the primary ideological obstacle.<sup>48</sup>

How Political Parties Can Use the Courts to Advance Their Agendas: Federal Courts in the United States, 1875–1891

HOWARD GILLMAN University of Southern California

This case study of late-nineteenth century federal courts in the United States sheds light on two seemingly unrelated questions of general interest to political scientists: What tools are available to party leaders who seek to institutionalize their policy agendas or insulate those agendas from electoral politics? and How do we account for expansions of judicial power? Using an historical-interpretive analysis of partisan agendas, party control of national institutions, congressional initiatives relating to federal courts, the appointment of federal judges, judicial decision making, and litigation patterns, I demonstrate that the increased power, jurisdiction, and conservatism of federal courts during this period was a by-product of Republican Party efforts to promote and entrench a policy of economic nationalism during a time when that agenda was vulnerable to electoral politics. In addition to offering an innovative interpretation of these developments, I discuss the implications arising from this case study for our standard accounts of partisan politics, political development, and the determinants of judicial decision making.

The history of the relations between Congress and the Supreme Court during the twenty-five years following the Civil War is most telling proof that the various organs of government are not mechanically set apart from each other.... The practical workings of the Supreme Court in the scheme of our national life may be as decisively determined by the extent of appellate jurisdiction allotted to it by Congress, the issues open on review, the range of jurisdiction of the inferior courts, and the machinery available for the disposition of business, as by the learning and outlook of the Justices, the quality and the training of the bar.

Frankfurter and Landis (1928, 86)

n this article I offer a case study in American political development—the dramatic and controversial expansion of federal judicial power in the late-nineteenth century—to illuminate two seemingly unrelated questions of general interest to political scientists: What tools are available to party leaders who seek to institutionalize their substantive policy agendas or insulate them from electoral politics? and How do we account for expansions of judicial power?

Exploring the relationship between these questions requires an integration of two relatively distinct traditions of political science research. The first tradition focuses on the motives and methods behind the creation or empowerment of potentially autonomous policy-making institutions by legislators or other power-holders who have a presumptive interest in maintaining tighter control of policy. The literature on this question typically looks at the origins of bureaucratic agencies or regulatory commissions, at decisions to delegate powers to such executive or quasi-executive bodies, and at the process by which oversight or control of these institutions is maintained. Studies have attributed institutional empowerment to a variety of political motivations including a desire to shift decision-making responsibility on issues that elected officials consider politically sensitive, enhance credible commitments to favored constituencies, reduce cycling effects or decision-making costs, and protect favored policies against reversal (for an overview see Voigt and Salzberger 2002).

The second research tradition looks at expansions of judicial power (see Tate and Vallinder 1995). Many scholars who have examined this topic have tended to attribute judicial empowerment to factors other than the short-term self-interest of elected power-holders acting on the basis of conventional political agendas.1 Many constitutional historians and law professors often take a law- or court-centered view and discuss judicial power as if it were a by-product of essentially legal choices that relatively independent judges make about the proper scope of their own authority. Other legalist interpretations suggest that nations may simply reach a point at a certain stage of their development when they begin to appreciate the systemwide advantages of the judiciary's enforcement of agreed-upon rules (Stein 1980). Some scholars who have studied the European Court of Justice (ECJ) have argued that the expanding role of the ECJ is a product of the efforts of various supranational and subnational actors pursuing their shared self-interests (e.g., Burley and Mattli 1993; Stone Sweet and Brunell 1998). Others have treated judicial empowerment as reflecting a more general interest in promoting "rule of law" governance, dispute resolution, or consensus politics (e.g., Elster and Slagstad 1988; Stone Sweet 1999; Tsebelis 1995). Relatedly, rational choice scholars have attempted to explain expansions of judicial authority in terms of establishing efficient mechanisms for the maintenance of investor security (e.g., Olson 1993; Weingast 1997, 1993), the oversight of bureaucracy (e.g., McCubbins, Noll, and Weingast 1987), and the desire to maintain policy stability in competitive party systems (Ramseyer 1994). (For a more complete overview of this literature see Hirschl 2000, 96–102.)

&lt;sup>1</sup> This may be due to a number of questionable assumptions: that the nature and scope of judicial power are a preconstitutional decision rather than a by-product of ongoing political construction; that courts are often policy-making competitors to legislators and thus less likely to be candidates for political empowerment by those legislators; and that courts are not best conceptualized as conventional policy-making institutions, at least not in the same way as bureaucratic agencies or regulatory commissions.

Unlike most of these accounts of judicial empowerment, I argue that the expansion of federal judicial power in the late-nineteenth century is best understood as the sort of familiar partisan or programmatic entrenchment that we frequently associate with legislative delegations to executive or quasi-executive agencies. In this case, however, the institutional beneficiaries of this entrenchment were courts rather than agencies or commissions.

It is generally acknowledged that federal judicial power in the United States, and the power of the Supreme Court in particular, expanded toward the end of the nineteenth century. A system of lower federal courts that at midcentury was understaffed and underpaid, was lacking in courtroom facilities (and thus was often forced to rent space from state governments), attracted men of little prominence, and had only limited jurisdiction had become by century's end a real third branch of government, with expanded personnel, a new layer of appellate courts, and dramatically broader jurisdiction (Hall 1973, 29–87; Purcell 1999, 687). A Supreme Court that only fleetingly, and insecurely, exercised power at the beginning of the nineteenth century, and that had undermined its reputation and authority among many former supporters with the Dred Scott decision in 1857, began after the Civil War to strike down laws with greater regularity and to involve itself in more significant national policy disputes (Graber 1998a, 1999; Griffin 1996, 97). The Chase Court voided at least eight federal laws between 1865 and 1874; another eight were struck down by the Waite Court up through 1888. An important troika of cases by the Fuller Court in 1895—on the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, the Income Tax, and the use of labor injunction—drew critical attention in the 1896 Populist and Democratic Platforms (Westin 1953).2 While the pre-Civil War Court struck down state laws at a rate of less than one a year (41 laws through 1864), the Chase, Waite, and Fuller Courts established a rate of about three laws a year between 1864 and 1895.3 By the 1890s, a "muted fury" toward federal courts had already begun to build among those who felt the need to resist what had become a bastion of conservative policy making (Ross 1994). Some prominent legal scholars also felt compelled to advise federal judges of the virtues of restraint (Thayer 1893).

In accounting for this expansion it has been common for scholars to argue that judicial activism was initiated by conservative judges who objected to the regulatory policies being pursued by other branches of government, with the goal of either constraining progressive legislation or (more generally) imposing conservative values on an increasingly tumultuous industrial order. Some versions of this argument assume a class-conscious and coordinated response by the bench and bar (e.g., Jacobs 1954; Paul 1960; Twiss 1942); others focus more simply on individual judges pursuing their policy preferences (Segal and Spaeth 1993, 304-5). Either way, the explanations assume that judicial power is best seen as arising in opposition to conventional political power in a zero-sum battle of control over policy making; in other words, an expansion of judicial power is treated as inconsistent with the preferences of legislators. On the basis of this assumption some normative constitutional theorists have even depicted these late-nineteenth-century developments as the moment when the judiciary began illegitimately to assert unprecedented policy-making claims against the elected branches, thus giving birth to the modern preoccupation with "judicial supremacy" or the "countermajoritarian difficulty" (e.g., B. Friedman 1998, 2001; Haines 1932; Jackson 1941).<sup>4</sup>

However, there are good reasons for thinking that late-nineteenth-century developments are best viewed as "politically inspired" rather than "court-inspired" (on this distinction see Sunkin 1994). As I demonstrate, much of the expansion of power resulted from the passage of two key pieces of legislation—the Judiciary and Removal Act of 1875 and the Evarts Act of 1891—that were part of the Republican Party's efforts to restructure national institutions better to facilitate national economic development (see Bensel 2000). The more familiar parts of this political agenda involved currency policy, tariff policy, and (eventually) national bureaucratic expansion (Skowronek 1982). However, the expansion of federal administrative capacity became necessary only after economic nationalists were successful at promoting large-scale enterprise by extending more reliable legal institutions to investors and Farmers' Loan and Trust Co., 157 U.S. 429, and In re Debs, 158 U.S. 564—only Pollock struck down a federal law. Still, the decisions to prohibit the application of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act to intrastate production and to uphold the power of federal courts to issue injunctions against unions represented significant policy statements on the scope of national industrial policy.

and the Fuller, White, and Taft courts continued this development (111 cases striking down laws from 1906 to 1915 and 123 from 1916 to 1925).

&lt;sup>4</sup> The language of judicial supremacy and claims of unprecedented judical activism overstate late-nineteenth-century developments. For example, key legal doctrines used by the Supreme Court were not as unprecedented as some of these authors suggest (Gillman 1993; Rowe 1999). Also, the "restraint" associated with the antebellum Court probably had more to do with the few opportunities to exercise judicial review (especially over federal laws), and with the Jacksonian Court's more oblique approach to voiding statutes, than with a change in the justices' attitudes about the appropriateness of striking down laws (Graber 2000a, 2000b).

producers who operated within a national market.<sup>5</sup> Federal judges became the principal agents of this agenda after Republicans in the national government retooled the federal judiciary by changing its jurisdiction, reforming its structure, and staffing courts with judges who were reliable caretakers of this new mission.

This account is consistent with the view that judges take on those powers, responsibilities, and agendas that are assigned to them by other power-holders in the political system (Peretti 1999, 133). Moreover, given that the two key legislative initiatives leading to federal judicial empowerment were passed by lame-duck Republican Congresses immediately prior to losing control of all or part of the Congress, this argument echoes Hirschl's (2000) "hegemonic preservation thesis," which assumes that elected politicians have a motivation to empower courts when their control over policy outcomes is challenged in majoritarian decisionmaking arenas. This account is also broadly consistent with what De Figueiredo and Tiller (1996, 438) call a "political efficiency" argument for judicial expansion, which holds that the House and Senate have an interest in enacting legislation "expanding" federal courts when they "expect the nominating president and the confirming Senate to appoint judges who will have political preferences consistent with those of the enacting Congress." However, rather than view late-nineteenth-century developments as merely an effort by Republicans to achieve short-term political advantages in the staffing of an existing institution, the account developed herein emphasizes the goal of establishing more long-term adjustments in the role or mission of the federal judiciary in American politics.7

<sup>5</sup> Skowronek (1982) provides an exemplary account of the development of national administrative capacity; but because the judiciary was also not a focus of that analysis, he relies too much on accounts that simply stress the conservative orientation of legal elites. No effort was made to analyze the actual steps taken by Congress and the presidency to facilitate judicial power. While he mentions in one sentence the Congress's expansion of the jurisdiction of federal courts, too much of his account leaves the impression that expansion was driven by judges as a natural response to industrialization: "The expansion of federal judicial power in the late nineteenth century was the natural response of the early American state to demands for national authority in the industrial age. Gradually over the 1870s and 1880s, the federal judiciary molded its new powers into an aggressive discipline for ordering governmental affairs." Still, he is fundamentally correct that "with nationalism, the Court recognized the continental scale of the new economic order and facilitated a concentration of governing authority.... [The Court sought] to sharpen the boundaries between the public and private spheres, to provide clear and predictable standards for gauging the scope of acceptable state action, and to affirm with the certainty of fundamental law the prerogatives of property owners in the marketplace" (Skowronek 1982, 41). I would add that this agenda did not originate with the Court and would not have emerged unless it flowed out of the regime politics of the period.

<sup>6</sup> During the period discussed in this essay Congress expanded the size of the U.S. Circuit Courts of Appeal seven times (adding nine judges in 1869, one in 1887, nine in 1891, three in 1893, one in 1894, and one each in two separate acts in 1895), and in all but two cases (1887 and 1893) the House, Senate, and president were of the same party.

<sup>7</sup> See also Barrow, Zuk, and Gryski (1996) for a discussion of judicial expansion and appointment politics. For my purposes, though,

Within the more familiar judicial politics literature the approach I am advocating is most closely related to research that links national court behavior to the interests of dominant coalitions and to broader changes in the political system (e.g., Dahl 1957; Graber 1993, 1998a; Klarman 1996; Gillman and Clayton, 1999). However, rather than focus on the constraints imposed on judicial decision making I want to highlight how the decisions of nonjudicial actors reconstructed and empowered the institution of the federal judiciary.<sup>8</sup>

THE FEDERAL JUDICIAL SYSTEM BEFORE RECONSTRUCTION

To understand the significance of postbellum developments some reminders about antebellum understandings are useful, since during this period the limited nature of federal judicial power also reflected the influence of conventional political considerations.

Early nationalists understood the relationship between strong central authority and a strong federal judiciary that was resistant to local influence—but so did opponents of strong national power, and one of their principal accomplishments in 1789 was preventing the creation of a truly nationalist judiciary (Marcus 1992). Federal judicial districts and circuits were tied to state boundaries.9 In almost all states only one federal trial judge was assigned (Virginia and Massachusetts received two), and these district court judges had to be residents of their districts. Federal district courts had remarkably limited jurisdiction. They were essentially authorized to hear only admiralty cases plus penalties and forfeitures under the laws of the United States. Circuit courts also acted primarily as trial courts and heard mostly cases involving diversity of citizenship. Importantly, federal district courts had no authority to hear trials on "federal question" suits, which meant that their definition of "institutional change" is overly narrow. They define institutional change as "a function of three components—bench expansion, replacements created by voluntary and involuntary departures, and elevations" of lower court judges to higher courts. This makes quantitative data collection more manageable, but it does not allow for an investigation of the ways in which judicial power may expand as a result of jurisdictional changes and evolving conceptions of the role of federal courts in the political system. While they acknowledge that institutional development may be "either quantitative (increase in 'business') or qualitative (enlargement or upgrading of mission), often connoting alterations of status within the political system as well," they do not provide an assessment of qualitative "mission upgrades" that alter an institution's status in the political system (Barrow, Zuk, and Gryski 1996, 7).

<sup>a</sup> Also, unlike rational choice analyses of the dynamics of interinstitutional politics (Epstein and Knight 1998; Epstein and Walker 1995; Ferejohn and Weingast 1992; Gely and Spiller 1992; Knight and Epstein 1996; Maltzman, Spriggs, and Wahlbeck 2000; Spiller and Gely 1992), the emphasis here is on how state-building led to an adjustment in the judiciary's "mission" or role in the political system (Gillman 1999) rather than on mapping out short-term and discrete strategic calculations in a given case.

<sup>9</sup> Federalists in the early-nineteenth century tried one last time to create districts independent of state boundaries. The District of Champlain would have covered parts of New York and Vermont, and the District of Cumberland would have covered western Maryland and Virginia. But the measure was predictably defeated (Wheeler 1992, 5).

most conflicts over national policy would have to be litigated in state courts. <sup>10</sup> The Supreme Court was given the authority under the infamous Section 25 of the Judiciary Act to review decisions by a state's highest court in which a claim based on federal rights was denied, but it took more than a quarter-century before that power was asserted in Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 14 U.S. 304 (1816) and that authority was immediately subjected to a prolonged siege by resistant states (Warren 1913). <sup>11</sup>

To mitigate further the centralizing potential of the Supreme Court the six justices were required to spend most of their time traveling in the states over which they had circuit responsibilities, where they would serve primarily as trial judges with very limited jurisdiction.<sup>12</sup> When they heard appeals while riding circuit they were required to participate with the local federal judge who made the original decision. Their circuit responsibilities ensured that these national officeholders would feel deep connections to their assigned states, and antebellum appointment norms solidified these connections by encouraging presidents to choose justices from the region of the country over which they would have circuit responsibilities (O'Brien 2000, 32-103). This tendency to view Supreme Court justices as representing regional interests was reinforced by the Judiciary Act of 1837, which increased the size of the Court from seven to nine while also expanding and realigning the circuits to account for Western expansion. To reinforce sectional influences no circuit contained both a free and a slave state; to ensure the protection of Southern regional interests (a goal of the second-party system) the slave states were divided into five circuits, meaning that they would enjoy a majority on the Supreme Court (Hall 1973, 18, 19, 448, 451; for a general discussion of the issues raised in the previous two paragraphs see Frankfurter and Landis 1928, 6–55, and Wheeler 1992).

There were minor adjustments in the structure before the Civil War, but they did not affect the central point: The organization of federal courts was related to larger political considerations about the limited role of the national government in American politics (see Skowronek 1982, 29). More specifically, one of the principal ways in which national power was kept in check was by ensuring that the principal agents of national law would be appointed with local or regional considerations in mind and (for good measure) would be overworked, poorly paid, and authorized to enforce only a subset of federal law (the rest of which would be filtered through state proceedings). Given that this was the goal, it is not surprising that when federal courts experienced serious caseload pressures in the decades before the Civil War, Congress felt no obligation to offer relief.<sup>13</sup>

These courts did do some work for the union (mostly in diversity and admiralty suits) and after Swift v. Tyson, 41 U.S. 1 (1842), they managed a small break from state influence when federal judges were freed from having to follow state law in diversity cases, thus creating a more national forum for interstate economic policy.<sup>14</sup> They were also able (with some difficulty) to enforce some federal policies, most significantly those relating to rights under the federal fugitive slave acts, which were enforced against antislavery forces in the North (Cover 1975). In the Compromise of 1850 Congress also vested the federal judiciary (through the action of federal commissioners) with the responsibility of deciding the status of runaway slaves; when we combine this decision with later partisan urgings to have the Supreme Court address the disintegrating slavery problem in the Dred Scott case, it is safe to say that there was a consensus among some party leaders that it was politically expedient to channel some aspects of national slavery policy into the federal courts (Graber 1993; Kutler 1968, 32–33). Still, the perceived utility of federal judicial power was very issue-specific, and all antebellum efforts to expand the general significance and power of federal courts in the political system were ignored or rebuffed.15

When the slavery interests separated from the national government at the beginning of the Civil War Republicans had their first opportunity to break Southern domination of federal judicial power. They also had their first opportunity to create a strong and effective national court system that could be the agent of Republican interests. But during this period reformers thought more in terms of reworking the traditional model to their partisan advantage rather in terms of serious institutional reconfiguration. Some influential historians of this period argue that Republican efforts in the 1860s represented a strong commitment to the expansion of judicial power to serve the ends of Reconstruction (Kutler 1968; Wiecek 1969), but it is probably &lt;sup>10</sup> As Casto (1997, 67–73) points out, there was relatively little substantive federal law in the early republic, and so this limit on the authority of federal courts may not be as remarkable as it might first appear (see also Purcell 1999, 691–93). At the same time, the decision to channel cases arising out of federal law into state courts demonstrates the level of distrust of national authority and the prevailing understanding of the relationship between federal court jurisdiction and national power.

&lt;sup>11</sup> Just to complete the record, with respect to other suits, no appeals could be made to the Supreme Court when the parties in alienage or diversity suits decided to litigate in state court; moreover, an overall amount-in-controversy limitation of $2,000 was placed on diversity and alienage appeals to the Supreme Court.

&lt;sup>13</sup> Hall (1973, 36) reports that in 1841 the Supreme Court had 106 cases pending but disposed of just 42; in 1842, 107 pending with 52 disposed of; in 1843, 118 and 36; in 1844, 168 and 46; and in 1845, 173 and 64. Congress debated reform in 1847 and 1848 but did not act. The situation was even worse in the lower federal courts. In 1849 the Court took matters into its own hand by limiting the amount of time litigants had to make their arguments (two hours per side).

more accurate to view these early steps as constrained attempts to change marginally the bias inherent in existing structures. While there were some calls from judges, prominent lawyers, and newspapers to increase the number of district courts, create an intermediate court of appeals, and eliminate circuit riding by justices, the Congress was still controlled by representatives committed to localism and regional representation on the Supreme Court (Hall 1975, 180-81). The Judiciary Act of 1862 succeeded in rearranging the circuits so that there were only three wholly Southern districts (a number that was reduced to one in 1866) and also gave Ohio and Illinois a prominent role in newly formed Northern circuits; Lincoln quickly cemented this traditional model by appointing Samuel Miller of Iowa, David Davis of Illinois, and Noah Haynes Swayne of Ohio to the Supreme Court. A year later regionalism was reinforced again when California and Oregon were brought into the system as a tenth circuit, with Stephen J. Field of California receiving an appointment. The new system ensured that the South could not dominate the federal courts and, thus, brought an end to "the judicial embodiment of Calhoun's concurrent majority," but it did nothing about circuit riding and it made no effort to assist with overburdened dockets at all levels of the federal court system (Hall 1975, 181; Kutler 1968, 16–21).

By 1865 Northern commercial and financial interests were pressuring Republicans to do something about docket overload. The bill that Lyman Trumbull introduced in late 1868 addressed the problem primarily by creating nine new circuit court judges who would have the same powers and jurisdictions as the assigned Supreme Court justice (who would still be required to attend at least one term of the circuit court during each two-year period). The decision to make these new positions circuit court, rather than district court, appointments was considered a modest way of mitigating traditional local (state-based) biases in the lower federal courts. Still, as Hall (1975, 182-85) summarized these developments, the federal judicial system "ended the decade of the 1860s in much the same condition they had begun, characterized by administrative decentralization and individuality.... At least in their institutional structure the federal courts proved resistant to the impact of the Civil War and the first years of Reconstruction. For their part, the Republicans emerged as at best reluctant nationalizers" (see also Fairman 1987; Kutler 1968, 50–63).

FROM RECONSTRUCTION TO ECONOMIC NATIONALISM

Initial and tentative efforts to expand the role of federal courts began during the War with the passage of the 1863 Habeas Corpus statute, which, for the first time since the "nullification crisis" of the 1830s, 17 authorized the "removal" of judicial proceedings from a state court into a federal court if the state proceeding appeared to a defendant's counsel to be prejudiced by reason of the defendant's status as a national officer. 18 The precedent was quickly built upon: Over the next few years Congress passed 12 removal measures extending federal court alternatives to state court defendants (especially blacks) who were not federal officials but who claimed that the protection of federal rights was being jeopardized by local prejudice. Removal also became an option in suits against all corporations (except banking) organized under a law of the United States, suits against common carriers for loss or damage to goods through the hostilities of the Civil War, and diversity suits exceeding $500 where the nonresident party could show local influence or prejudice (Frankfurter and Landis 1928, 61-63; Hyman and Wiecek 1982, 261-63; Kutler 1968, 143–60). 19

Reconstruction politics also led Congress to engage in piecemeal expansions of the role of federal courts in promoting or protecting national policies. The Federal Enforcement Act of 1870, a.k.a. the Force Bill, reenacted the 1866 Civil Rights law through the enforcement authority of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments and also prohibited state election officials from enforcing discriminatory state laws or interfering with voting on the basis of race. While enforcement was assigned to the brand new Department of Justice, the jurisdiction of federal courts was expanded to hear prosecutions brought under the statute, and removal authority was granted to protect federal officials and rights-holders from prejudicial state court proceedings. Federal judges were also authorized to call for troops to maintain peace at elections, having become now the first line of defense or offense-for the federal government when confronting challenges to national authority (Hyman and Wiecek 1982, 467). The following year another enforcement act was passed that was aimed primarily at Klan violence.20

<sup>16 &</sup>quot;...The revisionists' view [which correctly emphasizes that the Republican party was not hostile to judicial power] fails to emphasize sufficiently the local and regional pressures operating on a Republican party squeezed between a traditional commitment to the idea of judicial representation [of regional interests] and the need for more and better administered courts" (Hall 1975, 179).

 $<sup>^{17}</sup>$  Congress enacted the first removal statute in 1815 after many New England states resisted enforcement of federal embargo and nonintercourse statutes passed during the war of 1812. Federal customs officials who searched ships and seized cargo found themselves either sued in state courts by local citizens or criminally prosecuted by state officials, and Congress responded by providing for removal to a circuit court of "any suit or prosecution. . . commenced in any state court, against any collector. . . or any other officer, civil or military. . . for any thing done by virtue of this act or under colour thereof" (Ziegler 1995, 719-20).

 $<sup>^{18}</sup>$  Even though a case might be removed into federal court, the judge was obligated to follow the procedures of the state, except Negroes were allowed to testify even against whites and court officers (including lawyers and jurors) had to swear to their past and future loyalty to the Union (Hyman and Wiecek 1982, 261).

The Supreme Court upheld such removal jurisdiction in Mayor v.

Cooper, 73 U.S. 247 (1867).

&lt;sup>20</sup> Later, in United States v. Harris, 106 U.S. 629 (1883), the Supreme Court struck down part of the Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871 on the grounds that the protection of individuals from private conspiracies was a state function rather than a national function. The same year the Court had also declared unconstitutional the Civil Rights Act of

However, despite a spate of activity culminating in the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1875, by the mid-1870s the national enthusiasm for the vigorous protection of civil rights was diminishing (Keller 1977, 146; Stampp 1967). President Grant had effectively halted civil rights enforcement by 1873. Freedmen's Aid Societies in the North disbanded, racism became overt again in the North, and the language of reconciliation became more prominent. Federal patronage flowed from Grant to "respectable" Southern Democrats and convicted Klansmen were pardoned. Many Republicans attempted to kill the Civil Rights Bill, but the advocacy of a dying Charles Sumner led congressional leaders simply to put it off until after the 1874 elections. After stripping the bill of its most controversial feature (the clause requiring integrated schools), an unenthusiastic Republican party passed the bill (Foner 1988, 524-55).

In sharp contrast to their disintegrating commitment to civil rights was the party's increasingly clear focus on nationalism, and especially economic nationalism (Keller 1977, 181).<sup>21</sup> If Keller (1977, 285) is correct that, beyond patronage impulses, "public life in the years immediately after the Civil War was dominated by the conflict between the impulse to foster an active state and a broader national citizenship on the one hand, and deeply rooted countervalues of localism, racism, and suspicion of government on the other," then as a general rule it is fair to say that the former impulse frequently found its center of gravity in the national Republican Party leadership of the period, while the latter impulse often found expression in the resurgent Democratic Party.<sup>22</sup> The Republican Party's special focus on economic nationalism intensified after the violence of the Paris Commune in 1871, the rise of the Granger movement, and the Panic of 1873; according to one leading historian of the period it "marked a major turning point in the North's ideological development" as "older notions of equal rights and the dignity of labor gave way before a ... preoccupation with the defense of property" and "economic respectability" for largescale enterprise (Foner 1988, 517, 522). Ultimately the goal of Republican Party leaders was the creation of "a political economy in which central state power could sweep aside regional and local barriers to the development of a national capitalist market and directly assist in the construction of the physical and financial infrastructure necessary for that market" (Bensel 1990, 4, 11; see also Woodward 1966, 35, and Bensel 2000, xix).

This infrastructure was made up of a variety of elements, including tariffs, monetary policy, and railroad subsidies. Republican national party platforms during this period were distinguished by their consistent support for tariff protection and the gold standard, while Democrats consistently opposed "all three legs of the Republican developmental tripod, substituting free trade for protection, silver for gold, and government regulation for market-led economic integration" (Bensel 2000, 193). However, the new business practices and social structures generated by postwar economic forces also resulted in new legal issues and disputes, for example, between partners operating across state lines, interstate corporations and local governments, railroads and farmers, and innovators of new corporate and financial structures. Given that these various issues arose piecemeal in the context of litigation, it was clear that the only way to ensure that this activity remained within the province of national control and direction would be to rethink long-standing convictions about mission and authority of federal courts in the political system.

Federal courts were thus functionally well suited to play an important role in promoting a policy of economic nationalism. The construction of this market required sympathetic supervision of individual transactions rather than general regulative or administrative capacity; federal courts were institutionally positioned to "span the divide between state and national authority" and "constitutional principles provided an effective framework for monitoring federal and state attempts to regulate corporate consolidation and interstate commercial transactions" (Bensel 2000, 9-10). There was also a political advantage to the development of a more active role for federal courts. Federal judges were politically insulated from "hostile popular sentiment," and to the extent that they would act as agents of national economic development, it would be unnecessary for state Republican Party leaders to incorporate into political platforms explicit policy positions on the construction of a national market that might put a strain on regionally specific political coalitions (Bensel 2000, 190–93; for an overview of state party platforms during this period see Bensel 2000, chap. 3).

Consequently, in the wake of the midterm elections of 1874, where Democrats regained control of the House of Representatives, Republican leaders in 1875 quickly brought up for consideration in one lame-duck legislative session a subsidy for the Texas and Pacific Railroad, a repeal of the 10% tariff reduction of 1872, a mandate that specie payment be resumed within four years, and a bill to expand the jurisdiction of federal courts.

In contrast to earlier removal legislation, which focused on beefing up enforcement of a limited set of civil rights, the main purpose of the Judiciary and Removal 1875. As I discuss momentarily, by this time the national government had lost interest in these Reconstruction-era concerns.

by the Federal Government."

22 This nationalist-localist labeling of the parties at this time works as a general rule—especially in relation to the issue of federal judicial empowerment—but the point should not be overstated. As Bensel (2000, 101-2) puts it, "Ambitious [state] politicians constantly formed new party organizations, broke up old ones into factions, and led both into cross-party fusion agreements or coalitions."

As Frankfurter and Landis (1928, 57–58) put it, "National authority had to liquidate the institution of slavery, hitherto recognized by all the leading parties as the local concern of the states. By an easy transition other interests previously left to state action were absorbed by federal authority. The central government exerted power in fields which, in the past, would have aroused bitter opposition as encroachments upon the states. Transportation [mostly in the form of land grant aids to railroad and telegraph lines], education [mostly land grant colleges, a form of aid that had been vetoed by Buchanan in 1859 on the grounds that it was unconstitutional], commerce [homestead acts, postal expansions, harbor and canal construction, the encouragement of mining and timber exploitation], were actively promoted by the Federal Government."

Act of 1875 was to redirect civil litigation involving national commercial interests out of state courts and into the federal judiciary. Technically this meant granting the federal judiciary general "federal questions" jurisdiction—that is, the authority to have original jurisdiction in all civil and criminal cases "arising under" the laws of the United States—and removal jurisdiction in state civil cases that raised issues of federal law or that involved parties from different states.<sup>23</sup> The Act attempted to prevent obstruction of removal by authorizing federal judges to hold plaintiffs in default if a state court blocked removal; it also provided that a state court clerk who refused to effectuate a removal was guilty of a misdemeanor punishable by a year of imprisonment and a $1,000 fine (Purcell 1992, 15).

This reconfiguration of federal judicial power was finalized just as Republican Party domination of national politics was coming to an end. The recapture of the House by a more localist-oriented Democratic Party in 1875 (Keller 1977, 252–53), in combination with growing Midwestern and Western hostility to eastern financial interests and national corporations, led to various proposals to repeal or curtail newly expanded federal judicial power. However, given the partisan makeup of Congress and the presidency during this period of intensified two-party competition, these efforts at rollback were unsuccessful. For more than 10 years the pattern was for the House Judiciary Committee to report a reform bill favorably and for the Senate Judiciary Committee—now firmly in the hands of the Republican Party—to kill the proposal.<sup>24</sup> As long as Republicans controlled the House, the Senate, or the presidency, the new role for federal courts would remain entrenched; and given the power of "Eastern capital" in the Senate this veto point remained strong throughout the period (Frankfurter and Landis 1928, 91).<sup>25</sup> The most that was accomplished at the federal level by opponents of federal judicial power was an elimination of provisions that allowed plaintiffs to remove, a shortening of the time for filing removal petitions, and an increase in the jurisdictional threshold from $500 to $2,000 (Collins 1986, 738-56; Frankfurter and Landis 1928, 56-102; Purcell 1992, 15). More effective resistance took place at the state level, with some legislatures passing incorporation acts that required corporations to maintain offices in the state (thus ensuring that litigation would not be removable into federal courts under their diversity jurisdiction) or that required nonstate corporations to waive their rights to resort to federal courts (Bensel 2000, 324).

CONSOLIDATING ENTRENCHMENT THROUGH RELIABLE STAFFING AND INSTITUTIONAL RESTRUCTURING

If federal courts were going to facilitate the Republican agenda of economic nationalism it was necessary not only to expand their jurisdiction, but also to staff them with judges who were ideologically sympathetic to this new mission. Fortuitously, the appointment of federal judges did not require the cooperation of the House of Representatives, which was controlled by the Democratic Party for 10 years during the span from 1875-1891.26 Throughout this period, until Grover Cleveland's inauguration in 1885, the Republican Party controlled the presidency, and combined with their hold on the Senate, this meant that Republicans controlled the power to appoint federal judges. Even when Republicans (temporarily) lost the White House, they found that Cleveland's agenda for the Democratic Party was perfectly consistent with their goal of economic conservatism and nationalism.

It was because of this combination of Congressionally driven structural changes and executive-driven appointment politics that a system of federal courts that had recently been considered bastions of localism within the federal government were transformed into "forums of order" for national commercial interests seeking a hearing free from the interests and perspectives that dominated state proceedings (Freyer 1978, 1979). Grant alone made a total of 41 appointments to the federal bench, which by the end of his term resulted in a lower federal judiciary where 64% of judges were Grant appointees (posted to 21 of the 37 states) and 85% were nominally Republican. After Hayes the bench was 91% Republican, with 28% being Hayes appointees (Barrow, Zuk, and Gryski 1996, 29-30).

Of special importance in fortifying this agenda was the decision making of the United States Supreme <sup>24</sup> For 15 years before the Civil War the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee was a Democrat. In contrast, between 1861 and 1892, a Republican chaired the committee for every Congress except the Forty-sixth (1879-1881) (from the web site of the Federal Judicial Center, http://air.fjc.gov/history/topics/topics_congress_bdy.html [last visited May 15, 2002]).

A page later Frankfurter and Landis report a speech on the floor of Congress in 1880 by George D. Robinson of Massachusetts: "...In the West there have been granger laws and granger excitement that have led people to commit enormities in legislation and extravagances in practice; and in the South-why, sir, history is too full for me to particularize. Capital is needed to restore the waste places of the South and to build up the undeveloped West; it must flow largely from the old States of the East and from foreign lands. But it will not be risked in the perils of sectional bitterness, narrow prejudices, or local indifference to integrity and honor. I say then, let us stand by the national courts; let us preserve their power." This position was "effectively entrenched in the Senate" by virtue of "numerous appeals to that body from manufactures, from business organizations and their lawyers" (Frankfurter and Landis 1928, 92).

&lt;sup>23</sup> The short-lived Judicial Act of 1801 also bestowed general federal questions jurisdiction, but this last-minute Federalist measure was quickly repealed by the Jeffersonians. While Frankfurter and Landis (1928, 64-65) argued that the 1875 act granted to "federal courts the vast range of power which had lain dormant in the Constitution since 1789," Ziegler (1995, 736-40) claims that the act was perhaps slightly less bold than is suggested by this characterization, mostly because federal courts were not given general removal jurisdiction for state criminal cases where defenses implicated federal law. He speculates that Congress may not have thought that federal rights would play an important role in state criminal prosecutions and that the Supreme Court's continued appellate jurisdiction in such cases would be sufficient to address those rare cases.

Court. The justices would not have the day-to-day responsibilities of administering this policy in individual cases, but their decisions would establish the legal and ideological framework within which these other judges would be operating. A review of the 15 justices who were appointed between 1870 and 1893 confirms that they "were selected by presidents and confirmed by senators who carefully noted both their devotion to party principles and 'soundness' on the major economic questions of the day," especially their "attitude toward regulation of interstate commerce by the individual states" (Bensel 2000, 7).<sup>27</sup>

- President Grant started the trend of focusing on conservative economic nationalists by appointing two railroad attorneys and directors, William Strong and Joseph P. Bradley. Two years later he appointed Ward Hunt, who was also identified with railroad interests. Grant's replacement for Chief Justice Chase, Morrison I. Waite, had no prior judicial experience and never held national office, but he had a record as a successful railroad lawyer and director and, also, enjoyed the support of the Vanderbilts.
- After appointing John Marshall Harlan and William Woods, President Hayes attempted to nominate Thomas Stanley Matthews while he was serving as Midwestern chief counsel to financier Jay Gould. The Senate took no action, but Matthews was renominated by President Garfield and finally confirmed in 1881 by a vote of 24 to 23, with opposition arising mostly because he was considered too openly associated with railroad and corporate interests.
- President Arthur had two appointments: Horace Gray, an experienced state jurist and economic conservative from Massachusetts, and Samuel Blatchford, an experienced circuit judge with connections to New York's business and political elite.
- The conservative Democrat Grover Cleveland appointed two: Lucius Lamar, another railroad director and a former professor of political economy who, as a Senator, chaired the Standing Committee on the Pacific railroads, opposed free silver, and vigorously defended Matthews during his controversial nomination (he met strong Senate opposition as the first nominee who had been active in the Confederacy and was finally confirmed by a vote of 32–28, with 16 senators not voting); and Chief Justice Melville Fuller, a corporate lawyer and sound money advocate who left the Democratic Party after Bryan was nominated on a free silver platform.
- President Harrison had four appointments: David Brewer, a conservative judge with experience in the lower federal courts and the nephew of iconic conservative Justice Stephen J. Field; Henry Brown, with almost-identical credentials as an economic conservative; George Shiras, Jr., a Pittsburgh lawyer with an influential clientele of railroad, banking, oil, coal, iron, and steel interests (and who was supported by Carnegie); and Howell Jackson, a Democratic who was a former colleague of Harrison's in the Senate and a family friend.

• Finally, Cleveland had two more nominations: Chief Justice Edward White, a senator and an economic conservative, and Rufus Peckham, a former judge, corporate counsel for New York, and "confidant of tycoons" including Morgan, Rockefeller, and Vanderbilt.

These nominees were not always of one mind on all issues relating to economic nationalism. Still, it still worth emphasizing that all of these nominees fit within a fairly narrow ideological space that supported the assigned mission of federal courts during this period.<sup>28</sup>

Not surprisingly, these justices did not resist Congress's invitation to have federal courts more involved in supervising litigation involving large-scale enterprise. Just a few years after passage of the 1875 statute the Court held that Congress could authorize the removal into federal courts of any case that raised an issue of federal law or that otherwise fell within the federal judiciary's Article III jurisdiction (such as diversity jurisdiction) (Gold-Washing & Water Co. v. Keyes, 96 U.S. 199 [1878]).<sup>29</sup> A year later, Justice Bradley wrote a concurring opinion in which he expressed the view that "no cases are more appropriate to this jurisdiction or more urgently call for its exercise than those which relate to the foreclosure and sale of railroads extending two or more states, and winding up the affairs of the companies that own them" (Removal Cases, 100 U.S. 457, 480, 482 [1879]). By 1880, in another railroad case, the Court declared that in cases of removal the "only inquiry" was whether the suit was one "arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States' (Railroad Company v. Mississippi, 102 U.S. 135, 136 [1880]).30 Two years after the Court voided part of the Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871 on the grounds that the protection of individuals from private conspiracies was a state function rather than a national function (U.S. v. Harris, 106 U.S. 629 [1883]), a seven-two majority on the Court ruled, in the Pacific Railroad Removal Cases, 115 U.S. 1 (1885), that a suit against federally chartered corporations could be removed into a federal court

<sup>30</sup> Justice Miller dissented on the ground that removal should not be available in cases where the reliance on federal law was merely "incidental" to the defense.

even if the legal issues implicated ordinary state law claims and defenses. In other cases the Court did impose some minor jurisdictional limits,<sup>31</sup> but the overall record demonstrates that conservative Supreme Court justices were quite willing to support Congress's efforts to expand the control of federal courts over commercial litigation (Collins 1986, 730; Kutler 1968, 157).

Predictably, businesses flocked to these courts seeking more favorable case outcomes and legal doctrines.<sup>32</sup> By January 1, 1878, the federal circuit court in Chicago had 3,045 suits pending, 10 times the antebellum average. According to a House of Representatives Report in 1876, diversity cases were "the largest and most rapidly-increasing class of Federal cases," arising from rapid economic development and "the formation of numerous great corporations whose business connections extend into many States" (Purcell 1992, 20). In part this flood of litigation was motivated by reasons made explicit in the removal language of the 1875 statute, such as a desire to avoid local prejudice. But other advantages should not be overlooked, such as the control that federal judges had over juries (generally regarded as dangerously proplaintiff), which included the right to "comment" on the quality or weight of the evidence and direct or set aside verdicts. Verdicts in federal court also required unanimity among 12 jurors, and this was preferable for defendants in comparison to state rules that often allowed smaller or nonunanimous verdicts. Removal also allowed for more "forum shopping" by litigants looking for more sympathetic courthouses. This was particularly important given that the social and professional background of most Republican-appointed federal judges disposed them toward the viewpoints advocated by corporations (Fritz 1991; Hall 1976; Presser 1982, 69-127; Purcell 1992, 24-25). In a nutshell, they were "a remarkably similar, if not insular, social group" that was closely tied to "powerful political and economic actors, ... trained and experienced at the bar, steeped in the revered common law, and coming largely from the ranks of the corporate elite" (Purcell 2000, 320).

<sup>31</sup> The most important limit was the "well-pleaded complaint" rule, which held that the federal question must appear in the plaintiff's cause of action (see Louisville v. Mottley, 211 U.S. 149 [1908]).

In a relatively short period of time, with the assistance of an increasingly professionalized bar that viewed itself as obligated to "supervise, direct, and promote the great business interests of the country" (Keller 1977, 350; Twiss 1942), the federal judiciary articulated legal principles that were consistent with the promotion of a more unfettered national market. Federal judges presided over corporate reorganization and addressed problems of railroad finance through the practice of equity receiverships, all with an eye toward promoting more nationalist solutions over regional approaches (Berk 1994; Gordon 1983, 108; Purcell 1999. 732–33). At the top of the hierarchy the Supreme Court increased its supervisory authority over local economic regulation by invoking the commerce clause with unprecedented frequency and interpreting it to require courts to eliminate barriers to the free flow of interstate goods and services (Bensel 2000, 325-49; Freyer 1979; McCurdy 1978). The justices interpreted the Fourteenth Amendment to make it a constitutional violation for a state to regulate a person or a corporation in a way that prevented either from earning a reasonable return on invested capital, thus expanding the supervisory responsibilities of the entire federal judiciary over state regulations of business (Bensel 2000). 334). More generally, the Supreme Court insisted that all levels of government stifle tendencies toward favoritism or prejudice and instead adopt neutral and impartial regulations that were consistent with national standards of due process and equal protection for all (Gillman 1993).<sup>33</sup> In all these cases, doctrines proved extremely beneficial to large-scale enterprise; in fact, by 1890, the Commercial and Financial Chronicle commented that "the findings of our highest court are such as to put to rest" the dangers of "Socialistic legislation" and thus mark "an epoch in the industrial and constitutional history of the country" (Bensel 2000, 335).34

<sup>33</sup> Many of these doctrines were also being developed in state courts (Gillman 1993). The argument herein is not that federal judges were alone in elaborating business-friendly doctrines or that they were consistently more conservative than all state courts. Instead, the point is to explain the innovative inclination of federal courts to federalize certain kinds of precedents that promoted economic nationalism.

&lt;sup>32</sup> Purcell (1992, 21–22) cites L. Friedman's (1987) study of litigation in Alameda County, California, between 1880 and 1900, in which he found that of 340 personal injury suits, plaintiffs initiated only 29 in the local federal court. Of the 110 personal injury suits heard in federal court, 81 were there by way of removal. This meant that plaintiffs instituted 90% of their actions in state courts, and for every one case that plaintiffs brought in federal court three ended up there by defendants on removal. A similar pattern existed for insurance suits, with companies preferring the federal forum at least five times more frequently than plaintiffs. Plaintiffs discontinued about 45% of federal cases they initiated in federal courts, but their dropout rate rose to 64% for cases that had been removed to federal court. McCurdy (1978, 632-33) reports that "instead of responding to an existing free market of continental dimensions, producers of sewing machines and dressed beef actually ignored legal barriers devised by state governments and instructed their local marketing agents to invite arrest and conviction. At that point, the companies' headquarters mobilized the substantial financial resources necessary to press the Supreme Court for relief.... certain kinds of precedents that promoted economic nationalism.

34 It would be misleading to suggest that this agenda unfolded smoothly. The story of federal courts versus the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC), created in the mid-1880s, represents what Orren and Skowronek (1994) call 'intercurrence," conflicts between or among institutions that represent different interests within historical periods. Berk (1994, 178) suggests that for a time the ICC represented a kind of "regional republican" conception of railroad regulation but that in the end "the corporate liberal alliance of federal courts and national carriers. . . proved more powerful," and this characterization of the motivation of federal courts is consistent with the analysis in this essay of the mission they were promoting in the years after 1875. Compare Skowronek (1982, 151): By the 1890s "both the commission and the Court posed as bastions of intellectual and professional leadership insulated from the unstable and threatening forces of democratic politics. Both the commission and the Court sought to develop principles of regulation that would protect the railroad industry and promote further industrial development. Sharing this much in interest and orientation, the Court's emasculation of the ICC takes on the added dimension of an institutional conflict between two ideologically charged instruments of economic control.' The Supreme Court ruled in favor of the railroads in 15 of 16 cases it reviewed between 1887 and 1905; as early as 1897 the commission

However, the new mission of the federal judiciary was in such great demand that rising rates of litigation threatened a general collapse. Before institutional reconfiguration the Supreme Court's October Term of 1870 opened with 636 cases on the appellate docket. By comparison, the October Term of 1884 opened with 1,315 cases on the appellate docket; a year later it was 1,340; a year later, 1,396; in 1887 it was up to 1,427; in 1888 it was 1,563; in 1889 the docket was 1,635; and by 1890 the number was an astonishing 1,800 cases—an almost 300% increase in 20 years. The story in the lower courts was the same: In 1873 there were 29,013 cases pending in the circuit and district courts; by 1890 the number had risen to 54,194. One result of this caseload overload was that the traditional duty of the justices to attend circuit was practically a dead letter, since a Supreme Court term that went from October to May left only a few months to perform circuit duties that, in the belief of one contemporary, could not be performed in thrice that time (leaving that writer, Walter B. Hill, to lament that "It may well be doubted whether it is a wholesome example for Congress to pass laws relative to the highest judicial tribunal in the land which can only be intended in a Pickwickian sense") (Frankfurter and Landis 1928, 60, 86-87). Nine circuit judges (10 after 1887) were expected to hold circuit courts in 65

In these circumstances reform legislation might be considered an uncontroversial response to an obvious workload problem. However, during the antebellum period, a Congress that had little interest in promoting federal judicial power was often happy to keep federal judges overworked. Moreover, the caseload pressure of the 1880s resulted from institutional reforms that were still controversial. In fact, the preferred Democratic response to these pressures was not an improvement in the ability of federal courts to manage this workload; it was "complete elimination of all jurisdiction based on diverse citizenship" (Frankfurter and Landis 1928, 98).<sup>35</sup>

Given the opposing views of the two parties on the virtues of broad jurisdiction for federal courts, the caseload problem would remain uncorrected as long as divided government prevailed. It was not until 1889, with the start of the Fifty-first Congress, that Republicans once again controlled the House, the Senate, and the presidency and were thus in a position to respond as they saw fit to the pressures on federal courts. By late in 1890 Chief Justice Waite and Justices Harlan and Field each spoke out to urge Congressional action. The American Bar Association influenced President Harrison—who won the presidency with fewer popular votes than Grover Cleveland—to add a plea for an intermediate court of appeals in his annual message in December 1889.

In April 1890 a reform bill introduced by Congressman John H. Rogers came out of the House Judiciary Committee (Frankfurter and Landis 1928, 97–98). Of the 118 members voting to schedule debate on the bill, 115 were Republicans, two were Democrats (including Congressman Rogers, who in 1896 would later be appointed as a District Court judge by President Cleveland, confirmed by a Republican Senate), and one was a member of the Labor Party; every one of the 101 votes against debating the bill came from Democrats (Congressional Record—House, vol. 21, April 15, 1890, 3400).<sup>36</sup>

The bill's chief sponsor in the Senate, and the eventual namesake of the legislation, exemplifies the political and social forces that were behind judicial empowerment. William M. Evarts was a prominent New York lawyer before the Civil War with a sufficiently impressive reputation that he was retained by the national government to help argue The Prize Cases. In 1864 Lincoln was urged by many luminaries (including the Massachusetts governor and some Supreme Court justices) to appoint Evarts to replace Chief Justice Taney. He argued a number of cases before the Chase Court, defended Andrew Johnson in the Senate impeachment trial, and then became Johnson's attorney general. When he went back to New York he was a leader of the bar association and helped smash the Boss Tweed ring. He continued a very prosperous law practice, representing mostly railroads and other large commercial interests. He was the lead counsel for Republicans before the electoral commission looking into the disputed Hayes-Tilden election, and not long thereafter he was appointed by Hayes to be Secretary of State, as which he advised the president on (among other things) the use of federal troops to put down the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad strike of 1877. When he returned to New York he was instrumental in pushing the state's highest court to adopt due process interpretations that would prove emblematic of the so-called "Lochner era;" such as the decision in In re Jacobs, 98 NY 98 (1885), striking down the state's Tenement House Cigar Law on the grounds that it amounted to a class-based deprivation of the freedom to labor without any reasonable public health benefit (with Evarts adding that tobacco was a useful method itself reported to Congress that because of the justices the ICC had "ceased to be a body for the regulation of carriers" (Bensel 2000, 311–12). For an insightful discussion of how the final ICC bill incorporated Democratic Party concerns in the four swing states of the electoral college (New York, Indiana, New Jersey, and Connecticut), as well as its rural base, see James 1992.

&lt;sup>36</sup> Information on the party identification of those voting on the bill was obtained by searching the Biographical Directory of the United States Congress at http://bioguide.congress.gov/biosearch/biosearch.asp (last visited May 15, 2002). The other Democrat voting in favor of debating these reforms was Littleton Wilde Moore (D-TX), a former judge. The Labor Party vote came from another Arkansas representative, Lewis Porter Featherstone.

of fumigation). He was elected to the Senate the following year, just in time to lend his reputation, connections, and worldview to the cause of judicial reform (Barrows 1941).

The resulting legislation was patchwork reform rather than reinvention, but it solidified the developments of the previous decades.<sup>37</sup> The original bill introduced by Rogers would have fused district and circuit courts, created nine intermediate circuit courts with final decisions in cases arising solely through diversity of citizenship, and added two additional circuit judges for each circuit. Evarts's alternative, which he had first circulated for comments to the justices of the Supreme Court and selected circuit court judges (Barrows 1941, 481), formally kept both the district and the circuit courts but abolished the appellate jurisdiction of the circuit courts, thus leaving them to operate as trial courts alongside the district courts. It also identified defined classes of cases that could be appealed directly from federal trial courts to the Supreme Court and then channeled all other appeals through nine newly created circuit courts of appeal, which would have the final say in virtually all diversity suits unless the appellate judges certified that the case should be decided by the U.S. Supreme Court. The three-judges panels on these courts of appeal would be made up of one new court of appeals judge for each circuit plus available circuit or district court judges. Evarts's alternative satisfied some traditionalists who wanted to be able to say that elements of the old structure had been maintained (including circuit riding, which under this proposal would in effect be circuit visiting, since the actual work would be done by the new intermediate courts).

At conference the House yielded to the Senate's version and the Evarts Act was finally passed in March of 1891 by the lame-duck Fifty-first Congress (Frankfurter and Landis 1928, 97–102). As with the 1875 legislation, this reform came just in time for Republicans. The Fifty-second Congress that would start later that year had a House of Representatives that was dominated by 235 Democrats and contained only 88 members of the GOP.

The legislation was effective in reducing the Supreme Court's caseload. The number of cases before the justices fell from 623 in 1890 to 379 in 1891 and 275 in 1892. More importantly, the act—the first significant restructuring of the federal judiciary since the Judiciary Act of 1789—made it possible for the 1875 jurisdictional changes to persist. It also helped remove some of the traditional localizing pressures on Supreme Court justices caused by circuit riding. As a consequence, the Supreme Court could continue its development as a truly national institution, pursuing national political agendas by exercising those expanded powers and responsibilities that had been assigned to it as a result of the postwar political construction of federal judicial authority (Purcell 2000, 40).

CONCLUSION

The idea of political entrenchment in the judiciary, if not yet adequately incorporated into contemporary political science treatments of partisan politics or judicial empowerment, is nevertheless familiar to students of American constitutional history. When the Federalist Party lost control of the national government in 1800, their lame-duck Congress responded by passing the Judiciary Act of 1801, which expanded the size and jurisdiction of the federal judiciary and gave outgoing President Adams the opportunity to appoint loyal Federalists to the life-tenured federal bench. Incoming president Thomas Jefferson reacted by uttering his infamous lament: "The Federalists have retired into the judiciary as a stronghold and from that battery all the works of republicanism are to be beaten down and erased." As it turned out, though, Jefferson's fears never materialized. The Judiciary Act of 1801 was quickly repealed, with the subsequent approval of a besieged U.S. Supreme Court in Stuart v. Laird, 5 U.S. 299 (1803). When Congress began targeting judges for impeachment the remaining Federalists on the bench quickly learned that to survive their political climate they had to give up on the hope of using their office as a partisan forum (Whittington 1999). Over the years, John Marshall's Supreme Court was very careful about tailoring its decisions to the evolving preferences of the dominant partisan coalitions in the national government (see Graber 1998b and Klarman 2001).

In this case study I have tried to show why the sense behind Jefferson's lament is more appropriately directed at the actions of the postbellum Republican Party. These partisans were much more successful than the Federalists at transforming the judiciary into a programmatic stronghold. Why? The principal reasons have to do with some fortuitous political circumstances and a more advantageous institutional environment. Entrenchment was made possible because the Republican Party's post-Reconstruction commitment to an agenda of conservative economic nationalism congealed just as the Party was forced to hand over the House of Representatives to a resurgent Democratic Party, which means that the federal judiciary was one lame-duck session of Congress away from remaining as relatively weak and marginal as it had been before the Civil War. Republicans were able to control the staffing of these newly empowered courts only because a resurgent Democratic Party was able to win the House but not the Senate, and because two Republican presidents (Hayes in 1876 and Harrison in 1888) were able to win the White House with fewer popular votes than their Democratic opponents. Repeal was avoided throughout this formative period because Republicans maintained a political veto over such efforts by holding onto at least one institution of the national government. The consolidation of this agenda was made possible only because of the Republican's short-term control of the entire federal government during the Fifty-first Congress.

The fragile and contested nature of the Republican Party's agenda for economic nationalism provides a new perspective on the controversies surrounding the federal judiciary's more active commitment to conservative constitutionalism during the so-called "Lochner era"-a perspective on both why these judges adopted this agenda and why their place in American politics became increasingly controversial as they encountered emergent progressive politics in the twentieth century (B. Friedman 2001; Gillman 1993; Ross 1994). While the story of the overall development of federal judicial power in the United States does not end with the passage of the Evarts Act in 1891, the lessons of this account may help frame inquiries of later stages. The Evarts Act raised new issues that needed to be cleared up, such as unexpected increases in criminal appeals (addressed in subsequent criminal appeals acts) and the increasingly discordant position of the old (now nonappellate) circuit courts within this new system (leading to their elimination in 1911). The increasingly conspicuous role of the Supreme Court in the political system would be further advanced by the Judges' Bill of 1925 (which gave the justices more control over their decision-making agenda) and the subsequent construction of the Court's own building, the so-called "Marble Temple," in the 1930s.

At about the same time, two prominent law professors wrote an influential account of the political construction of federal judicial power as a way of advancing a different conception of the role of the federal courts in American politics, an agenda that focused on "constraining the reach of the conservative Supreme Court" (Purcell 1999, 684).<sup>38</sup> As one of these writers, Professor Felix Frankfurter, confessed in a letter to his friend Herbert Wechsler, "My central concern and the driving motive of my interest in the field [was the fact that] under the guise of seemingly dry jurisdictional and procedural problems, majestic and subtle issues of great moment to the political life of the country are concealed" (cited in Purcell 1999, 685-86). If we make Frankfurter's concerns our own, we might encourage students of party politics or delegation of powers to focus more attention on the ways in which executives and legislators use judges as extensions of conventional political or policy agendas. Conversely, students of law and courts might be encouraged to locate the scope and direction of judicial decision making into a broader analysis of party systems and partisan control of those institutions that are responsible for the jurisdiction and staffing of courts.

Socratic Political Philosophy and the Problem of Virtue

ROBERT C. BARTLETT Emory University

Plato's Meno deserves careful examination today because it highlights two facets of the concern for virtue neglected or obscured by the current revival of virtue among liberal theorists: the devotion to a good that cannot simply be reduced either to individual flourishing or to communal well-being—what Plato calls "nobility" or "the noble"; and the complex relation of virtue so understood to the concern for religion or piety. If the sought-for incorporation of virtue into liberal thought and practice today fails to grapple with these profound human concerns, in the first place by recognizing their existence, the language of virtue and its attendant moral sentiments will remain a matter more of scholarly debate than of lived practice.

ccording to a view of long standing, the liberal polity seeks to protect individual rights rather than to promote collective duties and maintains its vigor through institutional mechanisms that exploit selfish passions rather than elevate moral character; to such a polity, virtue is all but superfluous. As Montesquieu ([1748] 1951, 11.4) concisely put it, even virtue "is in need of limits": the noble virtue of the ancient republic is ultimately incompatible with and must be replaced by liberty as the rational goal of political life, and the maintenance of liberty requires, not an extraordinarily demanding education that culminates in self-abnegation, but institutional arrangements on the level of the state and a vigilant attention to what one is rightfully owed on the part of each citizen.

Reacting against this apparently impoverished and impoverishing conception, a diverse group of scholars today-classical liberals, communitarians, and neo-Aristotelians among them—seeks to elevate liberalism by returning to the idea of virtue. So it is that, from having been either an object of neglect or the subject of merely historical recollection, "virtue" is now among the liveliest and most controversial topics in political theory. Classical liberals, for example, discern in the founding documents of liberalism the concern to cultivate, if not the virtue of ancient Sparta or Rome, at any rate those character traits most needed by an independent citizenry in a free, commercial republic: The attention to moral character on the part of John Locke. Adam Smith, and the Federalist Papers, for example, has recently been brought to the fore (Grant 1987; Mansfield 1987; Tarcov 1984; Terchek 1986; see also Galston 1988, 1278-79). Others have followed up on this insight by delineating the contemporary "liberal virtues" understood either as the set of those characteristics that citizens must have if a liberal community is to survive—for "no regime can long survive unless qualities of mind and character that support its specific principles and purposes and counteract its unwise tendencies are deliberately cultivated and regularly exercised" (Berkowitz 1999, 11-12)-or as that which is conducive to "happiness or human flourishing" (Berkowitz 1999,

1 "For two generations, scholarly inquiry has been dominated by the belief that the liberal polity does not rest on individual virtue" (Galston 1988, 1277).

10), or as some combination of these (see, in general, Galston 1991, Macedo 1990, and Sandel 1996).

The reaction that this recovery of virtue within the liberal tradition has sparked is noteworthy: Alasdair MacIntyre (1985) has flatly and famously declared that, with the exhaustion of Enlightenment rationalism, we live in a time "after virtue," and only the rejection of that supposed rationalism, together with the adoption of a Thomistic Aristotelianism, can return us to coherent moral categories (compare Bartlett 2001, 45–54). Others, also inspired by premodern moral thought, have pursued a less radical approach by attempting to mix tenets of liberalism with a more robust or substantive account of the human good than liberalism typically permits (e.g., Nussbaum 1988, 1992; consider, in general, Volpi 1999).

However impressive these differing approaches to the problem of virtue may be, all appear to be seriously defective from the point of view opened by Plato's inquiry into virtue: for, to begin with, Plato makes clear both the power and the inadequacy of beginning from virtue understood as either that which is conducive to the well-being of the community of which one is a part of that which is conducive to a strictly private wellbeing. However naturally virtue may first come to sight as the performance of a task assigned us by our regime for the sake of its benefit, for example, we are attracted to that task in part by the hope that the completion of it will be good (also) for ourselves. Moreover, the demands of political health are not always in harmony with those of individual health, as is indicated by the necessity that every regime honor heroic self-sacrifice, for example (consider also Meno 73a4-a5 and context).2 As far as I am aware, none of the contemporary theorists has succeeded in demonstrating the identity of the virtue needed by the liberal community and that required by "human flourishing."

At all events, whether one defines "virtue" as the set of characteristics required by political well-being or by individual health, virtue so conceived is choiceworthy on account of something other and better than virtue itself. Virtue thus becomes a merely mercenary good (compare Berkowitz 1999, 172). That is, if these descriptions capture something of what we mean by "virtue," they also omit an aspect most vital to it, that of its nobility. And any account of virtue that ignores or obscures this, or that rushes past it by collapsing virtue into selfish concern, begins from a truncated version of it and indeed of the human beings who care for it (consider, in this regard, the terse dismissal of Kant's "entirely nonprudential account of virtue" in Berkowitz 1999, 131–33).

This essay offers a detailed exeges of Plato's Meno. It does so on the basis of the conviction that Plato is among the most important premodern sources able to contribute to the contentious revival of virtue among liberal theorists today. I suggest that if the analysis of virtue remains within the confines of strictly liberal presuppositions, the latest advocates of virtue will never attain the goal they most seek: the reconciliation of individual interest with communal well-being, the pursuit of happiness with the performance of duty. For Plato too recognizes these apparently irreconcilable concerns, but he attempts to bridge them by means of a third, what he calls "nobility" or "the noble" (to kalon), which may be provisionally understood as a good that is not simply reducible either to individual or to collective well-being. Though it can still speak powerfully to us, this conception of nobility is neglected by almost all contemporary discussions. What is more, Plato indicates that the concern for nobility brings with it an openness to and even a need for belief in an afterlife, one that is superintended by just or providential deities. That the contemporary debate pays very little attention indeed to virtue in its complex relation to religion or piety is another sign of its restricted scope (compare Budziszewski 1992). In brief, if the sought-for incorporation of virtue into liberal thought and practice fails to grapple with these profound human concerns, the language of virtue and its attendant moral sentiments will remain a matter more of scholarly debate than of lived practice.

If the possibility, at least, that Plato may shed light on this controversy is admissible, one must nonetheless choose from among the 35 dialogues that have come down to us as his. Even a cursory overview of them, however, makes readily apparent the most relevant to a discussion of virtue: The subject matter of the Meno, from its opening lines to its final words, is precisely virtue or human excellence (aretē). Indeed the Meno can even lay claim to being the Platonic dialogue on virtue, for although Socrates treats the several virtues at length elsewhere—justice in the Laws, Republic, and Gorgias; courage in the Laches and Protagoras; moderation in the Charmides; piety in the Euthyphro—only in the Meno does he raise and doggedly pursue the comprehensive question, "What is virtue?" The observations that follow are intended to be an introduction to the dialogue as well as an invitation to contemporary scholars to reconsider it.

ON THE MENO

Introduction

If the centrality of the question "What is virtue?" is the most obvious characteristic of the Meno, its next most striking feature is surely the resistance that Socrates meets with throughout in attempting to answer this question: for in the first and longest part of the dialogue (70a1-89e5), Socrates must exhort Meno on five occasions to define virtue or to investigate together with him what in the world virtue itself is (71d4-d8, 73c6-c8, 77a5-b1, 79e5-e6, 86c4-c6). And even after Socrates rescues Meno from the frustration he succumbs to when brought to see the inadequacy of each of his three definitions of virtue (71e1-72a5, 73c9-d1, 77b1-b4), Meno still prefers to investigate the lesser or subsequent difficulty of how virtue is acquired: He resists Socrates' guiding question to the very end (86c7-d2, 100b4-b6). If the root of his ultimate resistance to this question is his now-manifest confusion—as distinguished from his initial resistance or at any rate indifference, which stemmed from his conviction that it is "not difficult" to answer it and even "easy" to do so (71e1-e2)—we must wonder what it is that prevents Meno from taking the step that Socrates insists is necessary to clearing up this confusion (e.g., 79d6-e2). Moreover, in the brief but highly charged appearance of the democratic statesman Anytus that constitutes the dialogue's second part (89e6–95a1), Socrates encounters not merely resistance to his general line of inquiry but open hostility. Finally, in the last part of the dialogue (95a2-100c2), in which Meno returns as Socrates' interlocutor but at which Anytus is present as a silent witness (consider 99e2 and 100b8). Socrates' charge to Meno to persuade Anytus of the things that he himself has been persuaded of proves to be all but impossible: Newly equipped with certain "correct opinions" that as such tend to flee those who hold them (97e6–98a3), Meno is probably incapable of persuading Anytus of anything, let alone of making him "gentler" (100c1). And Socrates, for his part, knows full well that he will have occasion to converse with Anytus later on (99e3-e4). The resistance of Meno and that of Anytus combine to prevent Socrates from treating the question "problem of virtue" as he wishes and so to make of the Meno an apparently "aporetic" dialogue.

We can begin to discern the source of this resistance by noting that Plato chose as Socrates' principal interlocutors in the dialogue on virtue a future political criminal and a future accuser of Socrates: Menos, Socrates' pupil in virtue, will become a spectacular example of political vice a year or so after the dialogue takes place, (Xenophon Anabasis of Cyrus 2.6.21-2.6.29; Klein [1965] 1989, 36-38), just as Socrates' authority on virtue, Anytus (89e9-90b6), will become, a year or so after that, the most important of the three Athenian citizens who bring about Socrates' conviction on charges of impiety and corrupting the young and therewith his execution (Apology of Socrates 18b3 and context; Klein [1965] 1989, 223-25). If Plato's choice of interlocutors was not a frivolous one, we are meant to learn from it; and it leads us to suspect that this very political setting is somehow the appropriate one for investigating the question "What is virtue?" or that this apparently "epistemological" question is (also) a thoroughly political one. As for the subsequent question of the teachability of virtue, Socrates and Meno eventually arrive at not one but two answers: that virtue is knowledge or prudence and hence teachable and that virtue is not knowledge but a kind of correct opinion given by divine dispensation and hence not teachable. As we shall see, each answer responds to or makes explicit the two principles present in Meno's opinions about virtue—to the effect that virtue is one's own greatest good or happiness and that it is the carrying out of one's duty or task. The elusive unity of the class "virtue," which Meno and Socrates seek, will be uncontroversial only if one's proper tasks or duties are identical to the requirements of one's own greatest good. Plato does all he can, in part through the drama of the dialogue, to indicate how far apart these are.

Meno's Three Attempts to Define Virtue

The dialogue begins abruptly with Meno's barrage of questions: "Can you tell me, Socrates, whether virtue is something teachable? Or whether it isn't something teachable but is rather something that can be acquired by practice? Or whether it isn't something that can be acquired by practice or learning, but is present in human beings by nature or in some other way?" (70a1a4). The abruptness and relative complexity of Meno's query imply both an urgent desire to know the answer to it and some prior reflection on it. As for the latter, we discover eventually that Meno believes he shares Gorgias' opinions about virtue (71d1-d3) and that Gorgias himself, far from claiming to teach virtue, ridicules those others (the sophists) who do make that claim (95c1-c4). When the dialogue opens, then, Meno must at a minimum incline to the view that virtue cannot be taught, and this helps to explain the order of the alternatives he lists: first things first. Still, the eagerness of his question suggests that he has perhaps not settled the matter to his own satisfaction (consider also 95c7c8), as is confirmed by the fact that Socrates leads him to accept, for a time at least, the view that virtue can be taught (89c2-c4).

Because Socrates professes utter ignorance of "what in the world virtue itself is" and hence also of what sort of a thing it may be, a profession Meno greets with something close to incredulity (71b9-c2), it falls to Meno to offer the first definition of virtue: The virtue of a man is to be capable of carrying out the affairs of the city and, in doing so, to benefit friends, harm enemies, and take care that he himself not suffer any such harm, just as the virtue of a woman is to be able to manage the household well, both preserving its contents and being obedient to the husband. One could state in this way also the virtue of children, male and female, as well as of slaves and freemen, as Meno indicates. And contrary to the impression that Socrates' response leaves (72a6-b7 and c6-d1), Meno does offer, in addition to this enumeration of virtues, a definition meant to encompass them all: "There are also very many other virtues, so there's no perplexity in speaking about what virtue is. For virtue is related to each task for each of us in accord with each action and time of life."

Central to Meno's definition of virtue is the "task" ("work," "duty": ergon) assigned to each, the demands of the task in question determining the specific content or character of virtue in each case. The many and varied virtues properly share a single "form" (72c7, 72d8, 72e5) or constitute a single class because each permits its possessor to contribute directly or indirectly to one and the same goal, the well-being of the city. For if the will of the husband and the needs of the household together determine the virtue of the wife, what else but the will and needs of the city itself could determine the "task" and therewith the virtue of the man, charged as he is with tending to its affairs? Socrates himself, in the course of criticizing this account of virtue, draws attention to its political character by comparing it to a "hive" (or "swarm") of bees. And if Meno had answered the question of what it is that unites the many and varied bees, as he says he could do (72c1-c5), he might have parried Socrates' criticism: As the various bees form a single class because they are the beings that live in and contribute to the well-being of the hive, so the various virtues form a single class because they are the dispositions of soul leading each of us to contribute to the well-being of our political community.

This altogether political definition of virtue, approved of for all practical purposes by Aristotle in his Politics (1260a27-a28), leaves unclear whether the virtues in question are good also for the virtuous themselves. That is, if the virtuous man must see to it that he not suffer such harm as he may inflict on his enemies, will he also benefit himself as he is to benefit his friends (71e3-e5)? Socrates alludes to this difficulty by speaking no longer of the hive but of the health and strength of the individual man and woman (72d4–73a3): If virtue is determined by our "task," does not the performance of that task promise to be or to lead to our own wellbeing too? Does not virtue constitute the health and strength (of soul) of the virtuous? Virtue—justice and moderation, for example (73a9,73b1-b2)—seems to be the necessary means to carrying out the "task" peculiar to us as men or women, elders or children, and therefore to be the necessary means to our becoming good—to our becoming good, that is, not only as husbands or wives, elders or children, but as "human beings" (73a6c5, noting especially 73b4,73bb, and 73c1-c3).

Meno demurs: The case of the virtue of man and woman, on the one hand, and that of their health, on the other, seem "somehow" dissimilar to him (73a4-a5). In his first definition of virtue, then, Meno emphasizes the capacity needed to serve well a whole greater than oneself, and he may even harbor some doubt as to whether such service is good for the one who serves as well. But when prompted to fall once again under the influence of Gorgias (compare 73c6–c8 with 71d4), Meno attempts to fulfill (more) directly the promise of virtue to be good for the virtuous themselves. Virtue, he contends, is the capacity to rule human beings, ruling being the greatest good for those who do so (as he later affirms: 78c6-c9). The sought-for unity of virtue is here purchased at the price of excluding from the category all but the virtue of the man, as Socrates easily demonstrates by speaking now of the one example that Meno had mentioned in his first definition but that Socrates had thus far omitted, that of the slave (compare 71e1-72a1 with 72d4-d6 and 73a2): The virtue of the slave surely cannot be to rule others! Meno could have saved this second or amended definition by contending that the slave equipped with the capacity to rule would indeed be a poor slave but a virtuous human being nonetheless or for that very reason; he might have contended or conceded that a "virtuous" (=dutiful) slave is not a virtuous (=good) human being. But far from defending virtue understood as ruling, Meno is led by Socrates to abandon it immediately: Since only just rule is virtuous—because "justice, Socrates, is virtue" (73d9-d10)—the virtuous human being would rule only when justice permits or requires it. Virtue thus is or results in the attainment of the truly greatest good for oneself at the same time that it (in the form of justice if not also moderation: compare 73d9-d10 with 73a9-b2) may demand the sacrifice of that very good. In this way "virtue" comes to sight as both that which conduces to one's own good and that which may call for the sacrifice of one's own good, the latter more powerfully, perhaps, than the former. Ruling others is virtue (73c9), and justice is virtue (73d9-d10). Or, to put Meno's confusion another way, he contends that justice is both the whole of virtue and (merely) a part of virtue.

In his eagerness to advance their inquiry, Socrates proceeds to discuss the nature of definition so as to supply a model or models for Meno to follow in speaking about virtue (75a8-a9, 75b4, 75b11-c1, 77a5-b1). Socrates eventually raises two questions parallel to that pertaining to virtue: "What is shape?" and "What is color?" In taking up the first, Socrates pays close attention to what Meno says about shape or how he "names" or "calls" the various shapes (74d5–d6, 75d8, 75e11): We call the round a shape, not shape simply, just as we call the straight a shape, not shape simply; round and straight are in a sense opposites but nonetheless fall equally under the heading "shape." Why is this? Here Socrates is forced to state his own view: Shape is that which "alone among the beings happens always to accompany color" (75b9-b11). Socrates' definition sticks very close indeed to our ordinary experience of things, for we are somehow aware of both shape and color—the names for each are not meaningless sounds to us—even though we may be unable to state precisely what each is or to define the class character of each; and Socrates' definition serves to clarify the one by means of the other or to clarify the relation present in our ordinary experience of the two but of which we are not altogether aware. To understand the thing we call "virtue," then, we must make clear to ourselves the elements of it present in our ordinary experience, the interrelation of which may not be entirely evident to us.

In the third and last of his definitions, Meno attempts to resolve the tension present in his second, and in doing so he makes clearer still the conflicting principles that guide his conception of the class "virtue." Relying on the authority not of Gorgias but of an unnamed poet, Meno contends that virtue is the capacity of one who desires "the noble [beautiful] things" to provide them for himself (77b2-b5). As was evident also from the second definition, Meno himself strongly prefers the noble things to their ignoble counterparts, for he is willing to sacrifice what he understands to be his own good for the sake of what the noble (e.g., the just) course demands. But on what does that willingness rest? Socrates will soon restate the definition in question, with Meno's hearty approval, as "the capacity to provide the good things for oneself" (78c1; also 78c4-c5). He earns the right to do so in part by establishing immediately that Meno understands the noble things to be superlatively good (77b6-b7): Although there may be goods that are not noble, all noble things—just rule, for exampleare indeed good. That is, we surely desire the noble things because, as noble, they are attractive in and of themselves. Yet we also believe them to be good, which means in the context "good for us," as Socrates makes clear. For by maintaining that there is no one who wants to be wretched and unhappy, he corrects Meno's impression that there are some who desire bad things even though they know or suppose them to be bad: We desire the noble things because we believe them to be good and hence conducive to our happiness. Moreover, since all equally want to be happy or to possess for themselves the (truly) good things, and since virtue does not belong to all equally, virtue must consist in the capacity to attain those very things and not in the mere wanting or wish for them (78b3-c2; note Socrates' at least provisional approval at 78c3-c4).

As Socrates and Meno interpret it, then, this third definition of virtue resolves the tension present in the second by making all but explicit the hope that guides Meno in his attachment to "the noble things:" He hopes to be profoundly benefited thereby. Such "sacrifice" as nobility or virtue demands, then, is, properly speaking, no sacrifice at all. Moreover, the priority of the good to the noble that this account of virtue implies suggests in turn that if a given action could be shown not to be good for one, then neither could it be noble; and precisely one who is most devoted to the noble things should, as a result, be willing and even eager to forgo it. It remains for Socrates to determine how much of this Meno understands or accepts.

Since virtue is now the capacity "to provide the good things for oneself," acting virtuously should amount to securing health and wealth for oneself, as well as honors in a city and offices—the only sorts of things that are good according to Meno (78c6-c7). But Meno cannot abide by this understanding of virtue. On the contrary, Socrates quickly and easily leads him to the view that justice and piety—the latter being mentioned here for the first time (compare 74a4–a6)—sometimes demand going without such good things. Virtue consists in sometimes providing oneself (or, now, another: 78e5) with gold and silver and sometimes not providing them, depending upon the demands of justice. But, to repeat, Meno also believes that the very sacrifice of things good for him will, as a noble act, somehow also be good for him. Meno is even more attracted to the noble sacrifice of the things that he holds to be good for him than he is to the direct attainment of them, but he is so ultimately on the ground that such "sacrifice" is advantageous, though he appears not to be fully aware of that ground as such. Socrates concludes this argument by insisting that for as long as the class "virtue" remains unclear, it is impossible to state what its parts are, justice included (consider 79a3-a5, 79b2, and 79c8-c9). In his present condition, Meno has no basis on which to suppose that even justice is a virtue (consider also 71b1-b3).

Meno's Rebellion

When Socrates attempts for the fourth time to elicit from Meno a definition of virtue, this time recurring to the authority of Gorgias, Meno rebels (79e5–80d8). That is, after he playfully compares the effect of conversing with Socrates to that of being numbed by a stingray—and making clear in the process how politically dangerous Socrates' characteristic activity is (80b4–b6)—Meno states his famous "paradox": "By setting out what sort of a thing for yourself, from among those that you don't know, will you make your inquiry? Or even if you happen right upon it, how will you know that this is that thing which you didn't know?" (80d5–d8). Meno now seems doomed to remain at a loss concerning virtue; so frustrated is Meno by now that he even despairs of rational inquiry altogether.

Perhaps taking his cue from the previous day's conversation (76e8–e9), and certainly from their most recent inquiry (78d4, 78e1), Socrates now conducts an experiment by having recourse to an argument of a very different kind: "I have heard both men and women wise in divine matters—." And with this he hits home, for Meno interrupts him in midsentence: "Stating what account [logos]?" The wise logos in question proves to have two sources: It is stated both by those of the priests and priestesses who have been concerned with giving a logos of the matters in their purview and by Pindar and all the many other poets who are divine. If perhaps for different reasons, then, the teaching in question is sanctioned by both reason and divine inspiration. According to it, the human soul is immortal and never perishes, "dying" being a misnomer for what is in fact the continual regeneration of the soul. (We note that, in contrast to what we discerned in Socrates' discussion of shape and color, the world of experience as captured by our speech is now and in this crucial respect misleading; reality properly so-called lies beyond or behind the apparent one, the one given in and through ordinary speech.) And from this logos concerning the immortality of the soul, Socrates concludes that we must live out our lives as piously as possible because great rewards are available to those who do so: It is through the actions of Persephone that "glorious kings/And men swift in strength and greatest in wisdom" arise, men whose reputations remain unsullied for the rest of time. Socrates thus paints a vivid and alluring picture of the rewards—among them reputation and strength and rule—that await the politically ambitious Meno if only he will remain true to his (repeatedly demonstrated) inclination to forgo the direct pursuit of what he holds to be his own greatest good for the sake of or in the name of nobility, of justice in particular.

And yet, for all of Meno's interest in it, this part of Socrates' report does nothing to alleviate Meno's disheartened condition. What, then, is its purpose? We recall that, at the core of Meno's eagerness to sacrifice his own good lies his desire to obtain precisely the good things for himself, and we suggest that Socrates is here attempting to shore up that attachment to justice or nobility, already present in Meno, by strengthening the hope that guides it: If this world is not such that the noble (=self-sacrificing) are always rewarded for their nobility, let alone rewarded with great power and reputation, it becomes necessary to posit a different world, a subsequent life or lives, in which the noble will receive their just deserts through divine intervention. Only in this way will those who are most attracted to nobility or devoted to justice remain so attracted and be as content as possible with their devotion. Because Meno performed poorly on the earlier test meant to determine the extent of his self-knowledge, Socrates now has recourse to the view of the world made necessary by Meno's confusion and, to that extent, sanctioned by reason itself.

If Socrates' report concerning the rewards of Persephone does not directly assuage Meno's distress, his account of the soul's immortality is intended to do so. According to that account, the immortal soul has seen all things, both those in Hades and those here, and it is not possible for it not to have learned all things at some time. It is nothing to be wondered at, then, if the soul can be made to recollect the things that it once knew, provided it recalls some one thing first (81d2). Since our souls have already learned what virtue is, then, we need only recollect here and now the knowledge that is present but dormant in us. Thus what is called "learning" is but recollection properly speaking. (In this important case too, the way human beings speak of things is deceptive.)

After this brief series of assertions, which Socrates merely "trusts" to be true (81e1-e2), he is ready to return to the question of what virtue is. Meno, however, is not. And yet he challenges only the equation of learning with recollection—that is, he is willing to let stand Socrates' report concerning the immortality of the soul and the rewards of Persephone. This willingness is an important demonstration of the connection between Meno's state of soul and the "providential" view of the world he readily confirms. Convinced both that political power is the greatest good for himself and that it is noble sometimes to sacrifice the attainment of it, precisely because doing so is superlatively good for him, Meno fails to see what it is that he truly wants. The selflessness he is attracted to for selfish reasons renders him open to and indeed eager for the services of Persephone.

Socrates' lengthy response to Meno's paradox includes his celebrated conversation with one of Meno's slaves, the avowed purpose of which is to demonstrate the proposition that all learning is but recollection of knowledge gained in a previous life or lives. In three successive stages, Socrates poses geometrical puzzles for the slave to solve, despite, or rather because of, the fact that the slave has never been taught geometry; the correct answers the slave comes up with must therefore have a source other than knowledge acquired in this life. But on the basis of these exchanges, we conclude that the process of "recollection" is a difficult one, for the slave performs poorly under Socrates' questioning. In fact, Socrates himself leads the slave to the correct answers eventually, answers arrived at by performing simple acts of calculation, of putting two and two together (82d4; Sharples 1985, 8-9; Vlastos 1965, 159–60; Weiss [2001, 94] rightly notes the partly comic character of these passages). Attractive as these passages may be to us, they do not prove that all learning is recollection; still less that all can recollect equally: They establish only that the slave understands basic concepts of shape, size, and proportion (line, square, double, half) that would be known to anyone having learned a language (consider Socrates' all-important question at 82b4). The slave does not know and never "recollects" the name "diagonal," for example, because this is taught by sophists with whom he has had no contract in this or apparently any other life (85b4).

The arguments concerning recollection are defective in part because they beg the decisive question of the teachability of virtue; even if the soul has learned all things, Socrates nowhere proves that virtue is among the things that can be taught (Bruell 1999, 169-70). We must not forget that the entire digression with Meno's slave is meant chiefly to alleviate Meno's frustration or despair, and in this it is successful (compare 79e7-80d8 with 86c4–c7). That is, it is a rhetorical argument intended to persuade, one that Socrates himself admits he would be unwilling to fight very hard for (86b6-c2). But these exchanges do introduce an important puzzle concerning our knowledge of virtue. For even granting that the soul is immortal, that all nature is akin, and that every soul has-somehow-learned "all things" in a previous life or lives (81c5-d1), it turns out that we not only-somehow-forget the knowledge we have learned but also take on false opinions in its stead. Chief among these false opinions is our conviction that we know something—what virtue is, for example—when in fact we no longer do. And this means that, as there is an ignorance peculiar to our existence here and now, so there is a learning and hence a knowledge peculiar to our existence here and now that cannot itself be an example of recollection, namely, learning and hence coming to know that we do not know that something in fact (for previously we did know it).

The passage from our present ignorance to our knowledge of that ignorance is effected according to Socrates by "questioning" (86a7) of the kind to which he has just subjected both Meno and his slave. In both cases, Socrates elicits from his interlocutors opinions that are indeed present in them but of which they are not altogether aware; and as he now stresses, some of those opinions are true (86a7), although their truth is hidden in part because they coexist with false counterparts. While it may be quite possible not to know a specific human being and hence his characteristics, it now appears impossible not to have at least opinions, and indeed some true opinions, about virtue: With more justification than he knew, Meno reasonably greeted Socrates' profession of utter ignorance about virtue with disbelief (71a1-c2). What, then, is the source of these opinions in us, true as well as falseif we discount, as indeed we must, Socrates' official (theological-rhetorical) explanation? That the answer to this question involves considerations of politics appears from the remaining sections of the dialogue.

On the Political Character of Virtue

Despite Socrates' suggestion that they continue to pursue the question of what virtue is, Meno insists that they turn instead to the subsequent question of whether it is teachable. Socrates yields, but without letting his own question drop entirely: The question of the teachability of virtue will be considered by asking what sort of thing virtue must be, if it is to be teachable (87b2-b6).3 The gist of the argument runs as follows: Virtue is good; there is nothing good that is not encompassed or governed by (a kind of) knowledge; virtue is therefore (a kind of) knowledge. But in what sense are all goods encompassed by knowledge according to Socrates? Such external or bodily goods as health, strength, beauty, and wealth sometimes benefit us and sometimes harm us; only when we make "correct use" of each do they benefit us. This is true even of the things of the soul: What we call moderation, justice, courage, docility, memory, magnificence, and so on, benefit us only when they are guided by knowledge, and Socrates here identifies prudence as the knowledge of how to use these so as to benefit ourselves—courage absent prudence is but harmful boldness (88b3-b6; compare Protagoras 350a6-b6 and context). The standard determining not only the goodness of the external goods, but also the goodness and hence the virtuous character of the various "virtues," is their contribution to one's own good: All that issues in one's own happiness (88c3) or is advantageous (89a2) is governed by prudence; and since virtue is here nothing but the advantageous for oneself, it may be equated with (the whole or a part of) prudence (89a3-a4). We have thus returned to an understanding of virtue very close to that seen in Socrates' examination of Meno's third definition.

Socrates concludes from this argument that those who are good would not be such by nature, presumably on the grounds that if virtue is a kind of knowledge or prudence, it is acquired through teaching. But the evidence Socrates adduces to support this conclusion is puzzling to say the least: If there were such good persons by nature, the city would have set people to watch over them as soon as they became apparent in order to keep them from being corrupted and to ensure that they would become "useful to the cities." There are not overseers of this kind; therefore the good are not by nature (89b1-b7; note Meno's somewhat puzzled response). This reference to the political utility of the virtuous or good recalls an anomaly in the argument summarized in the preceding paragraph but omitted there: Between his assertion that all good things are encompassed by knowledge (87d4-d8) and his proof or clarification of it (87e5 and following), Socrates had added that not only would virtue, being good, be advantageous (beneficial), but so too would we be advantageous (beneficial) insofar as we are virtuous (87d8–e2). The latter assertion, which is developed only now and anticipates what is to come (96e7–97a4, 98c5–c6, 98c8– c9), compels us to wonder for whom or for what the virtuous are as such advantageous: for although virtue has just been equated with prudence and hence the capacity to benefit oneself or to be happy, it is now that which enables one to be "useful to the cities." We have thus returned to a definition of virtue akin to Meno's first. What is more, as soon as Socrates has introduced (or reintroduced) the idea of virtue as political service, he retracts the premise that virtue is knowledge and hence teachable (89c5 and following).

This drastic change in the argument takes place just before the arrival of Meno's guest-friend, Anytus: As Anytus takes a seat among them, Socrates is in the midst of arguing that virtue is not teachable because teachable things will have both teachers and students of them, and despite his best efforts, he has so far failed to find a teacher of virtue. That the "virtue" now under discussion is very far removed from prudence becomes clear from Socrates' restatement to Anytus of what it is that Meno wishes to possess, a restatement that emphasizes service to others in ways and to a degree that Meno himself never did: "[Meno] desires that wisdom and virtue by means of which human beings nobly manage both households and cities and tend to their own parents and know how both to receive and to send off citizens and guest-friends in a manner worthy of a good man" (91a2-a6). Socrates then retreats from his contention that there are no teachers of virtue just long enough to test Anytus' reaction to the possibility that the proper teachers of virtue are the sophists, who after all claim to teach it and charge a fee for doing so (91b7-b8, 95c1-c4). The vehemence of Anytus' condemnation of the sophists is matched only by its baselessness, convinced as he is of their pernicious character through no experience of his own or that of his kin. Anytus maintains instead that every Athenian gentleman is a competent teacher of virtue, and he thus belies Socrates' claim at the beginning of the dialogue that all Athenians would "laugh" at the suggestion that they know what virtue is or, therefore, whether it can be taught (compare 71a1-b4 with 92e3-93a4 and 94e3-e7). With the dramatic entry of Anytus, just after Socrates has begun the argument meant to deny that (political) virtue is knowledge or prudence, Plato reminds us of how politically charged the inquiry into virtue is and how dangerous or offensive Socrates' apparently modest claims to ignorance are.4

If common decency, as one might call the virtue now at issue, can indeed be passed on from elder to youth (93a2-a3) and father to son (95e9-96a2), in one way or another (consider 95e9-96a2 again in the light of Protagoras 325b5-326e5), the kind of virtue that Socrates speaks of next—that of the greatest statesmanship, embodied by such luminaries as Themistocles. Aristides, Pericles, and Thucydides—clearly cannot be: Even Anytus must admit that these illustrious fathers failed to pass on to those they most cared for, their sons, the skill or wisdom for which each is celebrated (93a2–95a1, noting especially the transition from "the noble and good" at 93a2 to "those good at the political things" at 93a5-a6). And just as the claim of the sophists to teach virtue was dismissed merely on the basis of Anytus' uninformed prejudice against them, so Socrates here denies the teachability of (political) virtue in both senses, the higher and the lower, solely on the grounds that the higher cannot be taught.

Evidently angered by Socrates (consider 94e3-95a1 in light of 99e2), Anytus withdraws from the conversation but not the group (91a2, 91a6, 92d4-d5). As a result, Socrates turns to Meno, but he too is unable to supply evidence that either the gentlemen ("the noble and good") or the sophists can teach virtue. Purportedly to establish not only that political men like Meno have contradictory opinions on the matter but that even a poet (Theognis) states contradictory things about it. Socrates adduces three quotations, the first dealing with learning from the great or powerful, the second with instilling intellectual understanding or comprehension (noēma), and the third with fostering such obedience as one gains from listening to a father's moderate words or tales. But Theognis speaks explicitly of teaching (or being taught) only in the first and third quotations (95d6, 96a1): In the case of great statesmanship or power, he contends that one can be taught noble (worthy: esthla) things by being with the powerful and being pleasing to them; and in the case of ordinary decency, he speaks of the effectiveness of obedience as distinguished from teaching. (As for the second and central case, the poet leaves it unclear whether teaching strictly speaking is possible.) If Theognis grants to the great what Socrates denies them, Theognis may nonetheless be free of selfcontradiction (see also Bruell 1999, 183).

Theognis' lines are important in part because they summarize the different understandings of "virtue" present in the Meno: political virtue understood as either common decency or great statesmanship, which Socrates insists is not teachable; and virtue proper, which is (a kind of) knowledge or prudence and is, as such, teachable. In the person of Anytus, moreover, Plato puts before our eyes a living embodiment of political virtue, certainly in its lesser form but also, as Anytus himself apparently believes (95a4), in its higher. As for the source of his opinions about virtue, no recourse to an immortal soul or to Persephone is needed to discover it, for he has come to hold the opinions he does as a result of the rearing and education given him in this life by his father Anthemion (90b1; consider also 95e9– 96a2), a self-made man noteworthy for his modesty as a citizen and his orderliness and good behavior as a man (90a1-b3). The correctness of that education and of the opinions thereby instilled in Anytus is confirmed for him in a most powerful way: by the hearty approval of the Athenian multitude, who "elect him to the greatest offices" (90b2-b3). Because he has received from earliest youth a most emphatic answer to the question, "What is virtue?" Anytus feels no need to raise it himself, let alone to countenance any suggestion that it is the sophists who teach it or-still less-that it cannot be taught at all: To affirm either would be to denigrate the paternal education he has received.

What is true of Anytus is true of us all to some degree. Each of us, that is, is reared in and educated by a specific family that is in turn shaped by a specific political community, and these place their mark on us, on our souls, as surely as Athens and Anthemion did on Anytus. Only by being brought to see the contradictory character of some of our most important opinions can we begin truly to question their adequacy; only through the kind of "questioning" (86a7) that Socrates has attempted to carry out in the Meno can the true but partially obscured opinions that dwell within us be roused and transformed into knowledge, those opinions that are merely "correct" ("orthodoxy") being abandoned in the process (note how carefully Socrates distinguishes between "correct" and "true" opinion: compare 97b1, 97b5, 97c4, 97c7, 97c9, 97d2, 98a7, 98b2, 98c1-c3, 98c10, and 98d1 with 86a7, 97b9, 97c2, 97e6, 98b7, 98d1, 99a2, and 99a5; see also Bruell 1999, 184). Neither Anytus nor Meno proves to be a proper subject of such questioning, for the whole of Anytus' life depends upon the stability of the answers he has already received; and Meno, though younger and thus having less at stake, proves unable to see or to face up to the nature of his confusion regarding virtue.

The final subsection of the dialogue (96d5–100c2), like Socrates' lengthy reply to Meno's "paradox," clearly serves a rhetorical purpose: It is meant to equip Meno with opinions that may enable him to "persuade" Anytus in turn and so to make him "gentler" (100b8c2). And as with that earlier reply (86b6-b7), Socrates here notes the inadequacy of the argument even as he makes it (100b4-b6; compare 98b2-b5). Leaving intact the argument that the virtue under discussion is not knowledge and hence not teachable, Socrates adds only that, for those who would guide "our affairs" (97a3-a4) or be "advantageous to the cities" (98c9) or guide aright "political action" (99b2), correct opinion, as distinguished from knowledge, is enough. Statesmen know what they are talking about as little as do soothsayers and divine prophets (99c2-c3, 99d1; compare 92c6). But if the source of (true) virtue, being a kind of knowledge, is learning or instruction, what is the source of this "correct opinion" or of the specific virtue in which it issues? According to Socrates, such opinion is granted them through "divine allotment" (99e6, 100b2-b3). This answer fills the gap left by Meno's opening question, in which he had spoken of teaching (or learning) and practice, as well as nature together with some unnamed fourth possibility (70a1-a4). The more obvious candidate to fill this lacuna might well seem to be nomos ("law," "custom"), the opposite of "nature" (physis). But nomos is conspicuous in the Meno by its complete absence, Plato resorting to paraphrases of it occasionally (see 70b6, 76d8, 82a5). Or could it be that, if not the word, at any rate its power is very much present in the dialogue, in which we witness its capacity to shape our opinions about virtue and, not least, about there being a "divine allotment"? At all events, the most that can be said in favor of Socrates' new suggestion is that it recalls the intervention of Persephone in granting to those who deserve it great power and strength and (a certain) wisdom (81b8-c4; consider 93e3, 93e7, and 94b1, as well as 90a2 and 91a3): The great statesmen are marked by an understanding that transcends human knowledge and that is justly theirs.

Socrates all but ends the dialogue by noting that there may be a sort of politician who can make others such as he is and who would thus be to those here as the wise Teiresias was to the mere shades of Hades (100a1-a7). This unexpected admission of the possibility of teaching politics would be unintelligible had not Socrates asserted, in the Gorgias (a dialogue to which the Meno is obviously and repeatedly linked), that he is perhaps alone among the Athenians in undertaking "the true political art" and is alone in carrying out "the political things" (521d6-d8): The true political art does what every political community tries but fails to do adequately, namely, to care for the health of our souls. Socrates, then, is the "politician" in question. Only he understands the needs of the soul and so its proper task; only he understands, as a result, its specific virtue. And virtue so understood, being rational, is teachable. We are reminded of how far Socrates is from the view of the world with which he had earlier enticed Meno, by the manner in which he now quotes Homer's description of Teiresias (100a2-a7): He alters the text (Odyssey 10.494–10.495) so as to suppress the fact that it was none other than Persephone who had bestowed on the great seer his powers. The understanding that Socrates possesses and (to the extent possible) teaches owes nothing to "Persephone."

CONCLUSION

As Plato makes clear, Meno is attracted to a conception of virtue (be it justice or piety) that calls for the sacrifice of the very things he holds to be best for himself; and what is true of Meno in this respect remains fully intelligible to us, once we are brought to see it. In and through our devotion to nobility, we seem to attain the greatest possible good for ourselves even as we, or precisely because we, forget or subsume or sacrifice our concern to attain that good. It should go without saying that there is something profoundly puzzling about this attraction or devotion, but unless modern theorists of virtue take it into account, in the first place by recognizing its existence, they will be unable to do what their recourse to virtue is meant to permit them to do: to speak of and to the whole of our humanity.

To be sure, the recognition of our concern with and even longing for nobility is but the beginning of Socratic political philosophy: As Socrates tries but fails to bring Meno to see, only by exploring our complex attachment to and hopes concerning "the noble" can we begin to understand our deepest wish. Moreover, reflection on such concern for virtue permits or requires us also to consider the highest question connected with it, that of the nature and existence of gods or a god, as Socrates' extended experiment with Meno indicates (81a5 and following). Just as the contemporary debate has neglected the peculiarly noble character of virtue, so it has proved particularly blind to the importance of religion or piety in any comprehensive account of human excellence. It redounds to the credit of a contemporary theorist, who would otherwise wish to separate the question of virtue from all "controversial opinions about human nature and metaphysical first principles" (Berkowitz 1999, 9), that he cannot finally avoid acknowledging their connection: "In the long run, a complete understanding of virtue does require an account of first principles and a defense of controversial opinions about human nature and the cosmos" (Berkowitz 1999, 13). Yet the same study suffers from a defect characteristic of most contemporary treatments of virtue,<sup>5</sup> for what takes the place of the admittedly necessary "metaphysical" reflection is a certain value relativism, adopted on the opening page of the study without argument and, as it were, in passing: "Not that the question of virtue has a single formulation or one right answer" (Berkowitz 1999, 3). It may well be that the "restrictive metaphysical assumptions" of both Kant and Hobbes must be rejected (Berkowitz 1999. 132), but the study in question does so on the basis of an equally restrictive, if largely unstated, metaphysical assumption concerning the unknowable character of the human good—and therewith an implicit rejection of such accounts of the human good as claim divine origin. The question that Kant and, especially, Hobbes knew they had to confront is simply dropped. If a "strategy of avoidance" of questions pertaining to "foundations" is indeed "appropriate to political debate" (Berkowitz 1999, 14), is it appropriate to—is it possible in—political philosophy? And it is to political philosophy that we must turn if we are to begin to understand the complexity of the problem of virtue.

Perhaps in no author more than in Plato, we liberals may come to understand the breadth and depth of our concern for "virtue," for a human excellence that presents itself as irreducible to any other good. Moreover, in gaining greater awareness of our hopes concerning such virtue or excellence, we become aware also of the necessity of reflecting on the question of the divine, a question the significance of which liberal political philosophy has done everything in its very great power to obscure.<sup>6</sup>

General rule: in the matter of changing religion, invitations are stronger than penalties."

Political Citizenship and Democratization: The Gender Paradox

EILEEN MCDONAGH Northeastern University

This research challenges models of democratization that claim liberal principles affirming the equality of rights-bearing individuals equably enhance the political inclusion of groups marginalized by race, class, or gender. While such explanations may suffice for race and class, this study's quantitative cross-national analysis of women's contemporary officeholding patterns establishes that gender presents a counter case whereby women's political citizenship is enhanced, first, by government institutions that paradoxically affirm both individual equality and kinship group difference and, second, by state policies that paradoxically affirm both individual equality and women's group difference. These findings challenge assumptions about the relationship between political citizenship and democratization, demonstrate how women's political inclusion as voters and officeholders is strengthened not by either a "sameness" principle (asserting women's equality to men as individuals) or a "difference" principle (asserting women's group difference from men) but rather by the paradoxical combination of both, and provide new views for assessing multiculturalism prospects within democratic states.

olitical citizenship—the right to vote and hold office—is a cornerstone of democratic theory and practice (Joshua Cohen 1996, 95). Models of democratization focus on two key features critical for expanding political citizenship: governmental institutions and state polices. At the most basic level, the institutional shift from inherited monarchical structures of political rule to electoral ones expands the base of those eligible to participate in formal political power. From the standpoint of state policies, important work by Karen Orren (1991) and Rogers Smith (1997) argues that an ideological shift from the use of ascriptive group characteristics—such as race, class, and gender—to liberal principles of individual equality as the basis of state policies expands the political citizenship of subordinate groups.

However, these assumptions about the relationship of political citizenship and democratization break down when we examine gender in the American case. At the founding of the American state, for example, the structural substitution of an electoral democracy for an inherited monarchy, while increasing the political citizenship of some men, decreased the political citizenship of all women. Some women lost the right to be queens, but by 1807, all states explicitly excluded women from the franchise, giving no women the right to vote. Kerber 1980, 1998; Keyssar 2000, 54).<sup>2</sup> Similarly, in the nineteenth century, institutionalization of cultural commitments to liberal principles of individual equality, while expanding the voting rights of white and African-American men, failed to secure the same franchise for any women—whatever their class or race.<sup>3</sup> Women did not obtain a federal guarantee of the right to vote until 1920, with the addition of the Nineteenth Amendment to the Constitution.

More significant than this protracted period of time, however, is the way reformers achieved this goal. They retained liberal, individual equality claims that women should have the right to vote in spite of their group difference from men but also asserted ascriptive arguments that women should have the right to vote

All forms of citizenship—social, civil, and political—are crucial for political inclusion; see Tilly et al. 1997. This study focuses on political citizenship because, although democracy comes in many forms, as Joshua Cohen (1996, 95) notes, it entails the "fundamental idea... that the authorization to exercise state power must arise from the collective decisions of the members of a society who are governed by that power... [m]ore precisely... as made within and expressed through social and political institutions designed to acknowledge their collective authority." For this reason, exclusion from political citizenship—that is, from participation in the institutional decision-making process—constitutes a serious violation of the very definition of democracy. For the way "exclusion" and "inclusion" have shaped American political history, see Shklar 1991.

<sup>2</sup> Ironically, the very country from which the United States rebelled—England—had, at the time of the founding of the American state, one of the most important and respected leaders that had been seen until that time, a woman, Queen Elizabeth I. With the founding of the American state, however, came a new ideology, republican motherhood, which assigned to women the political task of contributing to the public sphere by raising children to be good citizens rather than being voters or political office holders themselves; see Kerber, 1980. Though a number of states in the nineteenth century granted women voting rights until as late as 1890.

<sup>3</sup> In the pipatoath and the political state in the nineteenth century granted women voting rights until as late as 1890.

In the nineteenth century, reformers' successful use of liberal principles asserting the inherent equality of rights-bearing individuals resulted, at the state level, in dropping property requirements for white men by the midnineteenth century and, at the national level, in adding the Fifteenth Amendment to the federal constitution in 1870, guaranteeing voting rights for African-American men. Reformers' same use of liberal principles to challenge ascriptive ideologies and institutional structures blocking women's entry into the electorate, however, failed to achieve the right to vote for women either at the state level in the early nineteenth century or at the federal level in the late nineteenth century. For a discussion of how illiberal ideologies and institutional structures excluded women from political citizenship in the United States, see Kerber 1980. For an exceptionally thorough and critical analysis of the expansion of suffrage in the United States, see Keyssar 2000.

precisely because of their group difference. State policies in the Progressive era, such as protective labor legislation for women and mothers' pensions, affirmed the value of women's maternal group difference, and reformers drew upon the premise of such policies to argue that women's maternal group difference from men would prove to be a benefit to society, were women to have the right to vote. Thus, suffrage advocates invented a new, cultural justification for political inclusion, a paradoxical combination of liberal principles affirming the value of women's individual equality and ascriptive principles affirming the value of women's maternal group difference.

From an historical institutionalist perspective, the American case reveals the paradoxical foundation of women's political citizenship. Monarchies based on kinship group difference are political structures that can provide women with greater access to political rule than electoral democracies based on individual equality, and ascriptive arguments about women's group difference, combined with liberal arguments about individual equality, are cultural norms that can foster state policies that expand women's political citizenship more than liberal ones alone. This raises the question: Do these examples point merely to idiosyncratic attributes of an "exceptional" American state or to new explanations about the relationship between democratization and political citizenship in general?4

To answer that question, this research tests the hypothesis that structural and cultural paradoxical combinations affirming both individual equality and the value of women's group difference, when connected to government institutions and state policies, are key features of a political system that enhance women's election to national office. The results dramatically revise models of democratization and citizenship, sameness-difference debates in feminist theory, and multiculturalism perspectives.

GENDER AND OFFICEHOLDING

Most nations today extend voting rights to women, but women's election to national office, the other major component of full political citizenship, varies widely. Forty-two nations elected a woman as their head of state or government in the twentieth century. In the United States, however, no woman has even been a strong contender as the presidential nominee of a major political party, much less been elected to the office of the presidency. Similarly, in the 200-year period between 1776 and 1976, there were 1,715 men, compared to only 11 women who had served in the United States Senate; there were 9,591 men and only 97 women during that period who had served in the House of Representatives; and 507 men had served in presidential cabinets, compared to only 5 women (Cantor, Bernay, and Stoess 1992, 6). What is more, when we turn to the percentage of women elected to national legislatures in the year 2000, we see that the United States lags far behind other major, industrial democracies: In the United States women constitute only 13.3% of the House of Representatives, in contrast to Sweden, where women constitute 42.7% of the lower house of the national legislature; The Netherlands, at 36.0%; Germany, at 30.9%; South Africa, at 30.0%; Switzerland, at 23.0%; Australia, at 22.4%; Spain, at 21.6%; and Canada, at 20.6%.

That so few women are elected to national office in the United States is surprising, given the stature of the United States as a world industrial and political power, its strong feminist organizations, and its historic commitment to democratic values asserting the equality of all individuals. Most scholars explain this anomaly as a result of the power of political structures for setting opportunity parameters that enhance or depress women's recruitment to national office. In particular, researchers, such as Pippa Norris, have found that parliamentary systems benefit women, as do electoral systems that allow for proportional representation and multiple parties (Bystydzienski 1992, 204; Carroll 1990, 9; Darcy, Welch, and Clark 1994; Norris 1997; Welch and Studlar 1990). Researchers have also found the percentage of women in political office to be related to demographic characteristics. Women's educational rates, participation in the labor force, and percentage in professional occupations and a nation's urbanization, wealth, and population size all have been found to correlate positively with women's electoral success as national officeholders (Matland 1998; Norris 1987, 1996; Oakes and Almquist 1993, 71–81; Putnam 1976; Rule 1981, 1987). In addition, a national commitment to democratic practices ensuring individual rights and equality also fosters women's officeholding opportunities.7 The more rights and procedural safeguards there are, the more likely that women will be elected to national legislatures (Kenworthy and Malami 1999, 239-54).

In the American case, however, we noted additional features that enhance women's political incorporation into the public sphere as voters. At the founding of the United States, government institutions based on kinship group difference, such as the English monarchy from which the Americans rebelled, had provided more access to political rule for women than the new, electoral ones, based on individual equality alone. Similarly, in the Progressive era, the value of women's group difference, as expressed in maternalist state policies, combined with arguments asserting women's individual equality, spearheaded the successful campaign for woman suffrage.

The question is: Do these paradoxical combinations—government institutions of electoral rule based on individual equality combined with monarchies based on kinship group difference, on the one hand, and state policies based on individual equality combined with the value of women's maternalist group difference, on the other—establish a new model explaining women's cross-national officeholding patterns? If so, how does their explanatory power compare with attributes found by other scholars to be important? To answer these questions, this research examines the relative impact of political structure, political policies, demographic variables, and paradoxical combinations of structure and policies on contemporary national officeholding patterns for women in 190 nations.

VARIABLES AND DATA

Unit of Analysis: The Nation-State

The unit of analysis is the nation-state. Every nation that could be identified was included in this project, including nations that are members of the United Nations and those included in world almanacs and reference books, for a total of 190 nations.

National Legislative Officeholding

The dependent variable measuring women's political citizenship is the percentage of a nation's legislature that is composed of women in the year 2000 or the prior year closest to it. This measure is obtained from the Inter-Parliamentary Union. Much scholarship directs attention to women's distinct leadership styles, issue concerns, or voting patterns as voters or officeholders. This dependent variable, however, focuses on women's political recruitment: how women get into positions of political power in the first place—that is, descriptive representation, or what Norris and Lovenduski (1995, 94) term demographic representation. Although some question the significance of descriptive representation, others aver its value. As Virginia Sapiro (1998) argues, in a democracy it does matter whether women vote, an argument made similarly by Jane Mansbridge (1990, 1999, 2001).<sup>12</sup> Political scientist Barbara Burrell points to the symbolic, normative. and policy benefits that accrue to enhancing women's descriptive representation, arguing that women's election to positions in government provides a positive symbolic identification for all women; enhances the normative, democratic belief that politics is equally open to all, regardless of one's gender; and bolsters the passage of policies benefiting women, such as federal funding for child care programs, family and medical leave legislation, and abortion rights (Burrell 1994, 151–52). More recently, Nancy Burns, Kay Schlozman. and Sidney Verba found that women's descriptive representation has a positive effect on women's knowledge and interest in politics, important factors leading to the increased mobilization of women as voters and active political participants (Verba and Schlozman 2000).

Government Institutions

We measure the impact on women's officeholding of two major types of political structures: government institutions based on individual equality and government institutions based on kinship group difference. The individual equality of voters is the basic premise of liberal. democratic electoral systems. In some political systems, such as the United States, the equality of each individual voter, "one person, one vote," is even deemed a constitutional right (Gray v. Sanders 1963, Mahan v. Howell 1973). Thus, this project uses electoral systems as a measure of government institutions based on individual equality. Electoral systems, however, can be constructed in a variety of ways, and scholars have found this to be a significant influence on women's officeholding patterns. Specifically, women are more likely to be elected to national legislatures in parliamentary rather than in presidential systems and in competitive electoral structures characterized by multimember districts and multiple parties (Kenworthy and Malami 1999; Norris 1994, 1997; Norris and Lovenduski 1995). 13

as voters and officeholders; see Manin, Przeworski, and Stokes 1999.

In lieu of formal political rights or descriptive representation, some focus on the power of social movements, informal political associations, and organizations to achieve political goals. Political scientist Theda Skocpol (2000), for example, has shown powerfully how informal networks of disenfranchised women used their position as outsiders to craft maternalist policies successful for establishing innovative welfare policies, such as the passage in the Progressive era of mothers' pension legislation at the state level. Mary Katzenstein (1998) makes a compelling case for studying informal modes of political power.

<sup>12</sup> Also, scholars argue that processes of democratization are thwarted as long as women lack "access to social and political institutions and offices" (Bayes, Hawkesworth, and Kelly 2001). The presumption that all individuals in a group share a common characteristic, trait, or behavior invites the criticism of essentialism. As a vast. well-established literature argues, however, the category "woman" is a heterogeneous one inclusive of individuals for whom there is no one common denominator; see, for example, Spivak 1999. Others, such as Anne Fausto-Sterling (2000, 3), argue that even from a biological perspective, "male" and "female" are most appropriately envisioned as lying on a continuum of definition rather than forming two, bipolar, exclusive categories. Historically and politically, however, it is important to understand the representation of group difference, however flawed it may be. Hence, what is significant about the maternalist arguments about women's group difference is not the validity of the views, but the political innovation of socially constructing a subordinate group's difference to be a positive, rather than a negative or neutral, justification for their political inclusion.

13 Others, point to their political inclusion.

This research uses variables developed in previous research to measure these structural attributes and to assess their impact on women's legislative officeholding (Kenworthy and Malami 1999). Dummy variables are used, based on whether a nation has a parliamentary or presidential system; the "other" category is the omitted category. Multiparty electoral systems are coded 2 if voters choose among party lists in multimember districts that average five or more seats per district; 1 if party lists used by districts average fewer than five seats, or a combination of party list and candidate voting is used, or voters choose among individual candidates but in multimember districts; 0 if voters choose among individual candidates in single-member districts; and -1 if the electoral system contains no competition between any parties.

This project measures government institutions based on kinship group difference as a component of a nation's political structure by assessing whether governance includes a monarchical principle of rule. In past centuries, monarchical political rule based on an inherited kinship group difference, when open to women, was a significant point of direct access to political leadership. While ordinarily giving preference to men, most monarchical structures of the past nevertheless placed less emphasis upon gender as a qualification for officeholding than did electoral democracies, such as the United States. Those who "throw away" women monarchs on the grounds that their entry to political power on the basis of their elitist group difference renders them irrelevant to an investigation of women's electoral officeholding in electoral democracies miss a crucial structural lesson: Monarchies based on kinship group difference, when open to women, constitute a structural component of the state that can increase rather than decrease women's formal political power in the public sphere of governance, however symbolic that governance might be.

As Burns, Schlozman, and Verba (2001) note, examples of gender-integrated politics provide a crucial psychological mechanism for women's knowledge and interest in politics, which in turn affects their participation in politics. In this respect, monarchies open to women are government institutions that provide an example of political rule as not only a "man's game," but also a "woman's game" (Burns, Schlozman, and Verba 2001). Thus, although we can eschew the association of monarchies with castelike systems of feudal hierarchies, we also might do well to consider how contemporary monarchies open to women provide a "gender-integrated" example of political rule that could enhance women's acquisition of democratic political citizenship, including their election to national office. To test this hypothesis, this research measures whether a designated monarchical kinship group is a component of the state's political structure, where its power can range from all but absolute to that which is primarily symbolic. Monarchies constitute two dummy variables, one indicating a monarchy open to women as well as men and the other indicating a monarchy open only to men.

State Policies

This project accepts the definition of political culture as the basic political attitudes, belief systems, or ideological perspectives of a nation (Diamond 1999; Marx 2002). Although political culture is difficult to measure and often neglected, political scientist Larry Diamond contends that it is "a central factor in the consolidation of democracy" (Diamond 1992, 1999, 62–192; Inglehart 1997, 161–67). This project assesses a nation's cultural affirmation of individual equality and ascriptive group difference in general and women's maternal group difference in particular by analyzing state policies. The cultural affirmation of individual equality is measured by rating scales ranking nation's on the degree to which state policies guarantee democratic rights to individuals "in spite of" their ascriptive group differences by adhering to human rights policies, due process, and basic liberty guarantees, such as the right to a fair trial, freedom from torture or cruel forms of punishment, and freedom of the press, speech, association, and religion. The U.S. government regularly provides updates on the level of civil rights and political rights operating within nations, 14 as do human rights research organizations (Freedom House 1997). This project makes use of published rating scales, which rank nations from 1 to 7, where 1 is low commitment to individual rights and 7 is high (Freedom House 1997).

This project measures the cultural affirmation of group difference in general and women's maternal group difference in particular by assessing whether a nation constitutionalizes state policies providing protections, privileges, or protections to individuals "because of" their group difference. In so doing, this project draws upon the growing literature in public law claiming that constitutions define the central purposes and values of a polity as well as its institutional framework (Belz 1972, 640; Greenberg et al. 1993). As such, constitutions become a valuable source of information not only about the way nations structure their political institutions, but also about their political culture, that is, the basic ideological principles affirmed by a political system. 15 Constitutions are relatively more permanent than legislation and court decisions (Jackson and Tushnet 1999). Thus, the inclusions of provisions in constitutions, or the laws of the land that serve in lieu of a constitution, represent more enduring values of a political system than passage of legislation or court decisions alone. In the United Kingdom, for example, the laws that serve in lieu of a written constitution provide for a monarchy. That is not to say, of course, that there is no cultural discussion or political debate about the British monarchy but, rather, to say that its "constitutional acceptance" at the national level reflects a significant feature of British political culture and values.

This project's documentation of the presence of a constitutional affirmation of benefits to individuals because of their group differences, not in spite of them, complements and supplements the massive cross-national analysis of constitutional texts launched by the University of Wuerzburg's International Constitutional Law (ICL) Project, begun in 1996. The ICL Project is in the process of classifying all national constitutions on the basis of a common typology so that it is possible to compare the presence or absence of specific, textual provisions across constitutions worldwide. The ICL categories include type of government, support for minority rights, affirmative action protections, welfare benefits, and secularism. This project draws upon and expands those categories to include constitutional provisions affirming support to individuals because of their group difference in general and women's maternal group difference in particular.

Welfare Group Difference. This project adopts the definition of women's maternal group difference to be women's disproportional association with "carework" compared to men (Orloff 1993, 303-28). As Alva Myrdal (1941, 339-41) noted, prior to the advent of state social security policies, people were protected from disabilities resulting from illness, old age, and other affirmities by the care-work provided in the context of the family as an institution. Women within the family typically are identified as the primary performers of care-work in their roles as wives and mothers. Thus, in terms of political culture, women's maternal group difference from men is defined in terms of care-work (Orloff 1993). However, as Mrydal (1941, 340) observes, in the development of a welfare state, the "protective tasks which earlier had been provided for within the family are ... transferred to more expert public bodies...[to] a whole series of institutions...[forming] an interlocking system of social assistance." Typically, it is women who perform more care-work in the public provision of social assistance as paid professionals who disproportionally choose service occupations, such as social workers, primary school, nurses, or unpaid social service volunteers. Hence, women's disproportionate engagement in care-work—whether performed within or outside the home—culturally defines care-work, or welfare provision, to be "women's work." 16

All nations regulate marriage and family relations as a primary site for the provision of welfare. Many nations go further by legislating state policies for the provision of welfare, that is, care-work, as performed within or outside the home. Some go even further and constitutionalize care-work by making welfare provision an affirmative duty of the state. This project adopts the latter as a measure of a political system's cultural affirmation of the value of care-work by coding whether a nation constitutionally mandates state benefits, protections, or privileges to individuals "because of" their need for care-work as administered either within or outside the home. 17 Thus, the variable, welfare group difference, includes the constitutionalization of care-work benefits to the ill, the elderly, the disabled, and designated family members, such as mothers, children, and fathers. Nations that do so are coded 1; nations that do not are coded 0.

Additional Group Differences. Cultural group difference is measured as constitutionalized state protections, benefits, or privileges provided to individuals because of their cultural, racial, religious, ethnic, or linguistic group differences. This draws upon the work of scholars who define cultural minority groups in terms of ascriptive rather than behavioral characteristics (Fottrell and Bowring 1999, 45-51). Nations that constitutionally affirm at least one cultural group difference are given a score of 1; nations that do not are coded 0. Working-class group difference is measured as constitutionalized state protections, benefits, or privileges provided to individuals because of their status as workers; nations that do so are coded 1, and nations that do not are coded 0. Foreign group difference is measured as constitutionalized state protections, benefits, or privileges provided to individuals because of their status as foreigners within the political system; nations that do so are coded 1, and nations that do not are coded 0.

Demographic Variables

Scholars have found that demographic variables, such as women's entry into the paid labor force, are positively related to women's election to national office. This project examines the impact of demographic variables on women's officeholding patterns by including the percentage of women in the paid labor force, in professional occupations, and in secondary education as well as the population of the nation, its gross domestic product (GDP), and its percentage urbanization.

Paradoxical Combinations: Individual Equality and Group Difference

From the standpoint of government institutions, attention is rarely focused on monarchical rule based on kinship group difference in relation to processes of democratization, 18 much less the interaction effects combining monarchical structures and electoral political rule based on individual equality. This project, however, tests the hypothesis that political systems that paradoxically affirm the structural value of individual equality (electoral systems of political rule) and kinship group difference (monarchical systems of political rule) are ones that are more likely to have high percentages of women in their national legislatures. To measure the impact of these paradoxical structural combinations, two features of an electoral democracy—parliamentary system and electoral competition system—are each multiplied by the presence or absence of a monarchy open to women and by the presence or absence of a monarchy open only to men, producing four dummy interaction terms.

&lt;sup>16</sup> According to the U.S. Department of Labor, in 2001, women constituted 93.1% of registered nurses, 82.5% of elementary school teachers, and 90% of nursing aides (www.dol.gov/wb/). For an excellent analysis of gender, welfare, and the state, see Hirschmann and Liebert (2001).

&lt;sup>17</sup> Omitted from this coding are nations that constitutionalize carework as a duty of motherhood, fatherhood, or family roles. Rather, what is coded is whether a nation publically affirms the value of care-work as an affirmative duty of the state by providing benefits, privileges, or protections to individuals because of their relation to care-work.

Similarly, from the standpoint of state policies, the unidimensional, linear assumption that traditionalism and liberalism are antithetical poles on a policy continuum underlies most assessments of how the "dominant norms and values" in a country influence women's recruitment to political office (Norris 1997, 217). Thus, measurements are directed toward establishing whether a nation scores high on liberal policies supporting women's equality or scores high on traditionalism, as measured, for example, by its degree of Catholicism (Kenworthy and Malami 1999; Norris 1997, 217). Such a premise, however, fails to consider the additional possibility that rather than either liberal or traditional values, it is the combination of both that facilitates women's political citizenship. At the level of social movement activism, however, it was exactly such a combination in the early twentieth century that facilitated American women's acquisition of the right to vote, a major component of political citizenship. As historian Nancy Cott (1987, 29) notes, by the 1910s the efforts of male and female reformers to establish new government policies for the "regulation of housing, factory conditions, and community health and safety" facilitated suffragists' arguments that "modern conditions bridged the chasm between the realm of politics and woman's conventional realm of the home."19 However, even mainstream reformers, often portrayed as "social feminists" who "believed in woman's traditional role in society, that of mother and nurture" (Lunardini 1986, 150), nevertheless also conducted an equally vigorous development of individual rights arguments for woman suffrage (Kraditor 1965).<sup>20</sup>

Thus, this research hypothesizes that the strongest cultural influence on women's officeholding is the paradoxical combination of the value of individual equality and the value of women's group difference. Thus, this study assesses the independent effects of individual equality and group difference upon women's officeholding patterns and, more importantly, their interaction effects, that is, the paradoxical combination of both. Nations scoring above four on the seven-point democratic rights scale are scored as affirming individual equality. This dummy variable is then multiplied by the welfare, cultural, working class, and foreign group difference dummy variables to produce four dummy variables measuring the interaction effects of the affirmation of individual equality and the affirmation of welfare, cultural, working class, and foreign group difference, respectively.

RESEARCH FINDINGS

Independent Effects Models: Institutions, Policies, and Demography

Let us first consider the independent effects of structural (government institutions), cultural (state policies), and demographic characteristics of nations variables explaining women's cross-national officeholding patterns, as reported in Table 1. From the standpoint of structural variables defined in terms of government institutions, most electoral variables based on a premise of individual equality are statistically significant. As expected, party competition does have a positive impact upon women's political recruitment; the positive regression coefficient indicates that more competitive electoral structures boost women's percentage in the national legislature by more than 3% (3.115). Surprisingly, however, when all nations in the world are included, presidential systems have a greater positive impact on women's election to national legislatures than do parliamentary systems, where the former increase women's election to office by 3% (3.066) and the latter are statistically insignificant.

Most surprisingly of all, perhaps, is that monarchies based on kinship group difference (when open to women) are government institutions that enhance women's election to national legislatures the most, increasing the percentage by nearly 7% (6.822), as indicated by the positive regression coefficient. The presence of a male monarchy, however, has a negative impact on women's election to national office, decreasing the percentage by -3.425 at a statistical significance level that barely falls short of .100.

<sup>19</sup> Consequently, in the Progressive era reformers contended that women should have "the right to vote in order to ensure domestic welfare ... [which was] part of women's duties as wives, mothers, and community members" (Cott 1987, 29). Of course, group characterization of women included negative depictions intended to block their right to vote, similar to the way in which negative group characterizations of men marginalized by race and class were asserted to thwart the expansion of suffrage to include them. As a representative from Florida put it, "I am opposed to woman suffrage... [because] the place for the women is at home. That is where they belong.... The real mothers—I do not mean all of them, but the great majority of them—do not want it [woman suffrage]" (Congressional Record 1919, 89).

&lt;sup>20</sup> Carrie Chapman Catt, president of the National American Woman Suffrage Association (NAWSA), for example, in 27 speeches and articles dating from 1900 to 1920, cited "individual equality" arguments twice as often as "difference" arguments, 64 times compared to 32 times, respectively. As she stated, "Woman suffrage rests exactly upon the same basis as man suffrage. Women ask for it because it is the right of a citizen of a Republic to express a ballot's share in the making of the law the citizen is expected to obey" (Catt 1903, 5). These documents constitute the collection of Catt's papers housed at the Schlesinger Library, Radcliffe Institute for Advanced Study, Harvard University.

When we turn to state policies, we find only two statistically significant variables: democratic policies based on a premise of individual equality and constitutionalized care-work policies based on welfare group difference. Of the two, the latter is much stronger. Affirmation of democratic policies based on individual equality increases women's election to national legislatures by about 1.5% (1.499), but the nations that constitutionalize the provision of state care-work to those in need of welfare assistance elect more than 4.5% more women to their national legislatures (4.695). Equally interesting, however, is the failure of constitutionalized provisions targeted at cultural, working-class, or foreign groups to boost women's election to national office. None of these has a statistically significant influence on women's election to national office. Thus, we find that it is not just the integration of any group difference into the constitutional definition of state action that positively increases women's election to national legislatures but, rather, the integration of welfare group difference that enhances women's officeholding percentages in national legislatures.

When we turn to demographic variables, we find three that have a positive influence on women's national officeholding patterns: the percentage of the labor force that is women, the percentage of women in the professions, and the nation's gross domestic product. Unexpectedly, urbanization and population size have no statistically significant impact.

Paradoxical Combinations: Individual Equality and Group Difference

The American political system is an example of a nation that structurally affirms the principle of individual equality in its electoral system but not group difference, particularly not kinship group difference as a basis for political rule, as in a monarchical system. Founders of the American state, for example, were proud to distance themselves from any association with what were viewed as necessarily tyrannical monarchies. Constitutionally, this aversion to inherited principles of rule based on kinship group difference finds expression in Article 1, Section 9, which states that "no title of nobility shall be granted by the United States; And no person holding any Office of Profit or Trust...shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any... Title, of any kind whatever, from any King, [or] Prince." Hence, American political structures are constitutionally cut off from any connection with monarchical

The same is not true, however, of many other political systems. In terms of political structure, as measured by government institutions, nearly a quarter of the world's nations (22.11%) feature some form of monarchical rule, and of these monarchies, nearly 80% (78.57) paradoxically combine inherited rule based on kinship group difference with a democratic electoral system of rule based on the equality of individual voters. Scholars have found that competitive electoral systems enhance women's election to national office, but monarchies as a political structure that might influence women's political citizenship remain all but unexamined. If monarchies are insignificant, then we should find that a higher percentage of women is elected in competitive electoral systems, whether or not those systems also have a monarchy open to women. On the other hand, if monarchies do have a positive impact on women's election to national office, then we should find a higher percentage of women elected to national office in a political system that combines a competitive electoral system with a monarchy open to women. As Table 2 indicates, the latter proves correct. The mean percentage of women elected to national office for nations that have high electoral competition but no monarchy open to women is only 12.56, while the mean percentage for nations that have both soars to 28.06.21

In terms of state policies, the American political system is an example of a nation that affirms the value of individual equality but remains light years away from constitutionally providing benefits, privileges, or protections to individuals "because of" their group difference. Although the Progressive era has been noted as the golden age of an American maternalist state (Skocpol 1991), it is important to remember that reformers' success in establishing state policies for the provision of care-work was primarily focused on state legislatures, not the national Congress, and certainly not the federal constitution. In the early twentieth century, states passed mothers' pensions legislation to protect the welfare of women and children, and the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of statelevel protective labor legislation for women in 1908 in Muller v. Oregon. However, mothers' pensions legislation was never seriously considered by Congress, nor did sweeping protective labor legislation for women get on the Congressional agenda. What is more, the Child Labor Amendment that Congress did pass was struck Many other nations, however, do constitutionalize state provision of care-work. For example, Sweden constitutionally defines the "fundamental aims of public activity [the state]" to be "economic and cultural...[and that] it shall be incumbent upon the public administration to secure the right to...housing and education, and to promote social care and social security and a good living environment."<sup>25</sup> In the world at large, 78.4% of the nations constitutionally specify that it is an affirmative duty of the state to provide welfare benefits, that is, care-work, to individuals because of down by the Court as unconstitutional.<sup>22</sup> Eventual passage of the Social Security Act in the New Deal Era did nationalize the provision of some welfare benefits,<sup>23</sup> but Congressional support of even minimum care-work remains highly controversial to this day, as evidenced by the 10 years it took to pass the Family and Medical Leave Act of 1993, which provides only for up to 12 weeks' unpaid leave to care for a child, ill family members, or one's own health. It is safe to say, therefore, that although the American state does affirm individual rights, it is a long way away from constitutionalizing state policies based on group difference, including women's care-work group difference, to be an affirmative duty of the state.<sup>24</sup>

&lt;sup>22</sup> See Hammer v. Dagenhart 1918. Congress responded by passing the Child Labor Tax Law in 1919, levying a prohibitive tax of 10% on products manufactured in whole or in part by children, but the Court struck this down in Bailey v. Drexel Furniture Company 1922, declaring that Congress could not use its 'taxing power to accomplish an unconstitutional regulation." See Link and Catton 1980, 198, 323. <sup>23</sup> When welfare legislation was finally nationalized by the Social Security Act in the New Deal era, it nevertheless failed to address women's welfare needs adequately. See Mettler 1998.

What is more, many criticize Progressive-era maternalist policies for encoding in law restrictive roles and norms for women, which in effect limited, rather than expanded, women's full incorporation into the American state. See Stone 1994. From the standpoint of this project, however, although the FMLA uses gender-neutral terms in contrast to the maternalist-specific language of women's protective labor legislation and mothers' pensions in the early twentieth century, what is similar about Progressive-era maternalist policies and the FMLA is the use of public authority and resources to affirm the provision of care-work to others at the level of state and national legislatures but not the federal Constitution. For an insightful path dependence model analyzing the continuing impact of historical legacies on contemporary institutions and policies, see Pierson 2001.

their group identity as fathers, mothers, parents, children, the ill, the elderly, or the disabled. Of these nations, over half (53.02%) also paradoxically combine the constitutionalization of care-work, women's group difference, with an affirmation of the value of democratic rights based on individual equality. Even more significant, however, is that it is these that have the highest percentage of women in their national legislatures. As indicated in Table 3, the mean percentage of women elected to national office in political systems that constitutionalize state welfare provisions but not democratic rights of individual equality is 7.94; the mean for nations that only affirm democratic rights of individual equality and do not constitutionalize state welfare provisions is only 7.29%; however, the mean for states that paradoxically affirm both rises to 14.92%.<sup>26</sup>

The Full Model: Independent and Interaction Effects

It is when we turn to an assessment not only of the independent effects of government institutions and state policies, but also of their interaction effects, that we see the power of paradoxical combinations for enhancing women's election to national legislatures, as reported in Table 4. In this saturated full model containing both independent and interaction terms, the independent effects of all of the government institution variables and all of the state policy variables disappear; thus, there are no independent influences on women's election to national legislatures from type of electoral system or governmental system (parliament or presidency) or from whether a nation has a monarchy open to women. Similarly, there are no independent influences on women's election to national legislatures from any of the group difference variables, whether welfare, cultural, working, or foreign group difference.

When we turn to the interaction effects combining individual equality and group difference in the context of governmental institutions and state policies, however, we see a different picture. Nations that paradoxically combine governmental institutions based on electoral principles of rule (individual equality) and monarchical principles of rule open to women (kinship group difference) are expected to have national legislatures composed of 4.037% more women, as indicated in Table 4. Monarchies have no positive impact on women's election to national office, however, when limited to men. For monarchies to foster women's political citizenship, therefore, women must be politically incorporated not only as the mothers of monarchs, but as monarchs themselves.

Nations that paradoxically combine state policies based on democratic principles (individual equality) and constitutionalized care-work (women's group difference) are expected to have national legislatures composed of 6.73% more women than nations that do not, as indicated in Table 4. Significantly, however, the same boost is not there for combinations of individual equality with constitutional benefits, protections, or privileges "because of" other group differences, such as cultural, worker, or foreign group differences. Thus, in the full model, the only group difference that has a positive impact on women's election to national office is the constitutionalization of women's maternalist group difference, care-work, to be a component of state action, and, then, only when paradoxically combined with affirmation of individual equality as measured by democratic practice.

Demographically, in the full model the percentage of the labor force composed of women and a nation's GDP remain positive and statistically significant. This finding supports the work of others who argue that, along with welfare provisions, the most powerful catalyst for women's economic and political emancipation is access to the paid labor force (Orloff 1993, 318–22).

Subsets. We see further confirmation of these results by applying the full model to subsets of nations used by researchers in other studies (Lijphart 1999; Vanhanen 1997), as reported in Table 5. The full model is applied to Subset I, which is composed of 172 nations and, thus, is large and similar to the 190 nations used in this research (Vanhanen 1997). On the other hand, Subset II is composed of only 36 nations, all of which are democracies (Lijphart 1999), thereby making for a subset very different in composition from the set of 190 nations used in this research. In addition, Subset II contains two added variables: Lijphart's (1999, 312)

The patterns found in this study are validated by both the similar Subset I and the dissimilar Subset II. In both the dissimilar and the similar subsets, the paradoxical combinations of individual equality and group difference remain positive influences on women's election to national legislature, and in both subsets, the strongest impact on women's election to national office of any variable is the state policy combination of democratic rights and constitutionalized state welfare provision. In addition, both subsets show the positive impact of combining government institutions based on individual equality and group difference in the government institutions of the state: a competitive electoral system and a monarchy open to women in the case of Subset I and a parliamentary system and a monarchy open to women in the case of Subset II.

The Double Paradox: Government Institutions and State Policies

We identified two axes of the state that are critical for women's political citizenship: political structure defining government institutions and cultural norms constitutionalized as state policies. We found that nations that paradoxically combine individual equality and group difference on either axis enhance the election of women to national office. Nations that combine individual equality and group difference on both axes, however, in effect, incorporate into the state a double paradox, as it were, and as such, do even better, as indicated in Figure 1. Considering only those nations that have high electoral competition and high democratic practice, we see in Figure 1 that those combining individual equality and group difference on both government institutions and the state policies axes have the highest mean

CONCLUSION: GENDER AND POLITICAL CITIZENSHIP

The Gender Paradox

This project extends the analysis of women's political citizenship in relation to two major dimensions of statebuilding: What the state "is" in terms of its government institutions and what the state "does" in terms of its constitutionalized policies. First, from the standpoint of what the state "is," this research establishes that not only modern, government institutions based on a principle of individual equality benefit women's election to national office, but also traditional ones, such as monarchical systems of rule based on kinship group difference. Far from a meaningless symbolic attribute of a state, therefore, traditional monarchies to this day retain significant power for defining nationality and for enhancing political stability, as is evident in contemporary discussions of what are considered the more forward-looking monarchies in the Middle East, such as Morocco and Jordan (Jehl 1999, A3).

However, for monarchies to benefit women's political citizenship, they must be combined with the affirmation of individual equality and women must be eligible to rule as sovereign. The latter condition sheds light on Japan, one of the world's leading economic powers, which has an extraordinarily low percentage of women elected to its national legislature, only 4.6%, despite having high scores affirming individual equality, a competitive electoral system, and a monarchy. However, although eight women ruled as empresses in Japan in centuries past, since 1889, Japan's monarchy has been open only to men. After Crown Princess Masako gave birth to a baby girl, however, Prime Minister Koizum and 83% of the Japanese people support amending the Japanese Constitution to allow a woman to succeed to the imperial throne (Hernandez 2001, A3), a policy this study found to enhance women's access to electoral office. In the words of Junko Kamikita, a homemaker, "It would be good to have a woman as the symbol of our state, just like Queen Elizabeth or Prime Minister Thatcher. If we have a female symbol of state, the Japanese people's notions [about women in politics] would change" (French 2001, A3)<sup>27</sup>.

Second, from the standpoint of what the state "does" this research supports previous scholarship establishing that state policies have an important impact on women and that welfare state policies, in particular, are "women-friendly." However, it goes beyond such findings by showing that it is not just the constitutionalization of women's group difference, care-work, in the form of state policies providing welfare to those in need, that boosts women's election to national office but, rather, the paradoxical combination of constitutionalized welfare policies and democratic state policies affirming individual equality. The significance of the latter is hidden in many studies that focus on western European nations where the presence of democratic rights affirming individual equality is a virtual constant, making it appear that it is the variation in the provision of state welfare benefits alone that makes a state women-friendly. This research alters that view by showing that affirmation of principles of individual equality also are women-friendly, when paradoxically combined with the constitutionalized affirmation of the value of women's group difference, that is, care-work.

Models of Democratization: Paradoxical Combinations

Our identification of the gender paradox as the basis of women's political citizenship dramatically revises models of democratization and citizenship. It has been usual to ignore monarchies as political structures relevant to democratization processes and to view ascriptive principles of group difference as antithetical, if not destructive, of liberal principles of individual equality for promoting the political inclusion of subordinate groups. Some understand political citizenship, therefore, as advancing only when the latter prevail over the former. As Rogers Smith (1997, 36–37) has argued, the Enlightenment idea of the equality of all rights-bearing individuals, when dominant, fosters an institutional commitment to greater political equality, which in turn generates public policies securing the political inclusivity of marginal groups. Liberal ideology, therefore, serves as the basis for evaluating "legal systems that automatically subordinate women, blacks, Native Americans, homosexuals, and non-Christians...[as] presumptively invalid"—a crucial mechanism for establishing alternative institutional structures and public policies for achieving greater political inclusivity." Thus, as Smith contends, in the context of the multiple traditions characterizing the American state, the dominant pattern for achieving the political inclusion of marginal groups is for the liberal tradition based on individual rights and equality to compete with and triumph over an Americanist tradition based on ascriptive principles stressing group difference.28

Karen Orren (1991, 40, 95), in her pathbreaking analysis of labor in the United States, Belated Feudalism, also associates liberalism with the "art of demolition," that is, as an instrument for destroying feudal principles of obedience based on group difference so as to replace them with liberal principles based on the concept of "voluntary and intentional" individuals.<sup>29</sup> In her view, economic rights expand only when liberal precepts based on individual equality compete with and prevail over ascriptive ones based on master-servant group differences. Similarly, in her new and challenging framework for evaluating constitutional and political development, she argues that we must direct attention to the contest between "officers' rights" and "citizen rights." Officers' rights are a holdover from a feudal organization of political society honoring deference, as based on group difference hierarchies, in contrast to the location of rights in the citizenry at large. Democratic practices expand, not by combining the two, but only when the latter prevail over the former (Orren 2000).

&lt;sup>28</sup> Rogers Smith notes that woman suffrage is a counterexample to a model positing the power of liberal principles to overcome political exclusion based on ascriptive characteristics. He recognizes "that women's voting rights were won through a combination of liberal, republican, and ascriptive arguments, with the latter more prominent in the era of final success." However, Smith also acknowledges that "he treats these combinations as ineradicably problematic," in contrast to the analysis here suggesting "that in many societies, these apparently paradoxical combinations work quite harmoniously"(personal correspondence, 2002).

Yet this study found that we must also view ascriptive and liberal principles in combination, not only in competition, with one another,<sup>30</sup> such that the shift from ascriptive principles based on group difference to liberal principles based on individual equality need not be an "all or nothing" process. The expansion of woman suffrage in the United States, for example, was enhanced when reformers paradoxically combined liberal arguments based on individual equality with ascriptive arguments based on the value of women's maternal group difference. Far from an historical curiosity or an example of American exceptionalism, however, we also found that this paradoxical combination enhanced the election of women to national office in contemporary, cross-national contexts. In particular, it was not just any group difference that enhanced women's election to national office but, rather, a group difference that was specifically identified with welfare, or care-work, that is, with maternalism or "women's work. When combined with the affirmation of individual equality, the constitutionalization of welfare provisions was found to be the most positive influence on women's election to national office.

Similarly, although it is usual to write off monarchical structures as politically irrelevant to processes of democratization (Anderson 1991), this study found that monarchies open to women paradoxically combined with competitive electoral and parliamentary systems have a greater positive influence on women's election to national legislatures than do such electoral structural features alone. This finding adds to our understanding of how the "mode of transition" in periods of regime change affects political citizenship (Munck and Leff 1999), particularly the impact on women's political citizenship. Rather than a unilinear change from inherited monarchical regimes based on kinship group difference to liberal electoral ones based on individual equality, women's political citizenship is fostered by the paradoxical combination of both, thereby bolstering the contention of Orren and Skowronek (1994) that to decipher parameters of development is to identify mixed orders of change and sequence.

Gender: From Nation to State

Scholars have long emphasized two crucial components of democratic consolidation: national unity of the people and stability of political institutions (Huntington 1968; Rustow 1999), that is, the nation and the state, respectively. It has been noted how gender figures prominently in the construction of the nation, that is, the way in which a political community is "imagined" (Anderson 1983) or "invented" (McClintock 1991). As scholars argue, women's group difference from men can be used as the very emblem of national identity. The veiling of women in Muslim communities, for example, can be viewed, rather than as a return to tradition, instead as a cultural symbol specifically constructed in contemporary times to signify national independence from the West (Ahmed 1992; Badran 1994). Similarly, historian Nancy Cott (2000) cogently argues that public policies regulating marriage as the institutional site of family and sexual relations provided the United States with a mechanism for developing and maintaining a cohesive national identity.

This study found, however, that what is crucial for women's political citizenship is the incorporation of gender difference into the construction of the state. Gender difference is defined by women's disproportionate association with biological and social reproductive labor. Biological reproductive labor refers to the generation of people, including kinship groups, by means of pregnancy and birth. This is a type of reproductive labor engaged in only by women; hence, women's disproportional association with it. Social reproductive labor is the nurturing and care of people once they are born.<sup>31</sup> Not all women do more social reproductive work than all men, of course, but as a group, empirically, women do more, both within the family and in the paid labor force as social workers, nurses, elementary school teachers, and service volunteers; hence, women's disproportional association with nurturing and care.

Political scientist Jacqueline Stevens (1999) powerfully analyzes the way in which the state construct kinship rules, such as marriage regulations, to control membership in a political society. She thus focuses needed attention on the political relevance of biological reproductive labor in relation to the state. However,

Orren analyzes how liberal principles based on individual equality are institutionally located in legislatures that draft positive law and how feudal principles based on hierarchial group difference are institutionally maintained by a judicial system drawing upon common law precepts as its reference for decision-making.

&lt;sup>30</sup> As Ira Katznelson (1999, 570) notes, there is a particular affinity between "illiberal impulses" stressing inherently unequal group differences and republicanism because republicanism is "characterized by a strong elective affinity for clear and deep principles of inclusion and thus of exclusion." Also, many fault liberalism for its incapacity for including subordinate groups. See Hirschmann 1989; Pateman, Hirschmann, and Powell 1992; Scalia 1998; and Sinopoli and Hirschmann 1991.

&lt;sup>31</sup> Social reproductive labor is "the activities and attitudes, behaviors and emotions, responsibilities and relationships directly involved in the maintainance of life on a daily basis...how food, clothing and shelter are made available for immediate consumption, how the care and socialization of children is accomplished...[how the] care for elderly and infirm is organize" (Brenner and Laslett 1991).

she does not address the impact on women's political citizenship of reproductive labor as a constituent component of government institutions or constitutionalized state policies. Yet that is exactly what some political systems do. Political systems that institutionalize monarchies based on kinship group difference, for example, structurally make biological reproductive labor—women's group difference—a constituent component of the state's government. Other political systems constitutionalize care-work (welfare provision) to be an affirmative duty of the state, thereby making social reproductive labor—women's group differencea constituent component of state policy. This study found that it is this use of gender—women's group difference—to construct the government institutions and constitutional policies of the state that enhances women's political citizenship.32

Yet another major finding of this study is that it is not solely the incorporation of women's group difference—biological and social reproductive laborinto state construction, but the paradoxical combination of women's reproductive labor group difference and the affirmation of women's individual equality that increases women's political citizenship. Significantly, the principle of individual equality in liberal theory and practice corresponds to an opposite type of labor: productive labor. As John Locke formulated the labor theory of value, all human beings are born equal by "virtue of their "self-ownership," that is, their capacity for productive labor. When an individual mixes her or his productive labor with raw material, the resulting product is that person's property. One of the major purposes of the liberal state is to protect property as generated by productive laborers presumed to be equal. This study confirms the work of others who found that women's incorporation into the paid labor force as productive workers also has a positive influence on women's political citizenship. So, too, does the affirmation of individual equality in the form of electoral competition and equal state treatment of individuals in spite of their group differences.

However, this study clarifies that the crucial issue for women's political citizenship is the construction of the state on the basis of not one, but the two essential work tasks<sup>33</sup> of every society, productive and reproductive labor, corresponding, respectively, to women's dual, if not paradoxical, identities as productive laborers who are the "same" as men and as reproductive laborers who are "different" than men. Without the state's affirmation of the liberal principle that all individuals are born free and equal—the liberal premise of productive labor—women lose the right to challenge state policies that stereotype and limit women's opportunities on the basis of their reproductive group identity. Equally significant, however, without the integration of women's reproductive group difference into the state's construction, as Seyla Benhabib (1987, 160; quoted in Nash 1998, 32) puts it, "[A]n entire domain of human activity, namely nurture, reproduction, love, and care...is excluded from moral and political considerations and confined to the realm of 'nature,'" thereby severing women, in terms of their group identity, from the state.

Feminist Theory and Practice: Sameness and Difference

The paradoxical combination of individual equality and women's group difference identified in this research and its association with productive and reproductive labor, respectively, also addresses the all but intractable debate among feminists and others striving to improve women's position in American society.<sup>34</sup> The very definition of liberalism, which assumes the existence of "free and equal individuals," places women, according to Kate Nash (1998, 32–34) in a "catch-22" position. On the one hand, if women adapt to male norms by asserting their equality and sameness with men, they do so at the cost of negating the reproductive and nurturing roles disproportionately associated with women, thereby destroying their specificity as women. On the other hand, if women assert their difference from men, their very specificity as women categorizes them as deviant from the universalistic formulation of the liberal principle that all individuals are equal, in the sense of being the same. Thus, as Nash (1998, 1) notes, "Most contemporary feminist political theorists see liberalism as unequivocally incompatible with feminism...[because to use] the universal principles of liberalism to try to gain equality with men and liberty from subordination to men is doomed to failure. It will only contribute to the advancement of those women who mimic men and, since no women can do so beyond a certain point, ultimately it will fail them too." This conundrum has produced what legal scholar Robin West (1988, 1) identifies as a jurisprudence analysis polarized into a masculine "separation thesis" and a feminist "connection thesis."

This study finds, however, that sameness and difference need not be mutually exclusive approaches and, thus, need not form what Amy Gutmann (1985, 316-18) terms "the tyranny of dualism" or what Jean Cohen (1999, 252) defines as the ambiguity about whether "uniform equal rights and respect [are] owed to every citizen due to their individual status as legal persons or to their membership status as belonging to a particular political community." As this research establishes, it is not that liberal principles of individual equality "fail" women (Klausen and Maier 2001); indeed, we found that democratic rights affirming individual equality are crucial for advancing women's political incorporation as voters and officeholders. Rather, it is that individual equality is "not enough." As we discovered, women's political citizenship, rather than requiring an either/or choice between individual equality and women's group difference, advances on the paradoxical combination of both.35

Multiculturalism

This study's identification of the gender paradox, exemplifying the paradoxical combination of individual equality and the value of group difference, has an important relationship to multiculturalism debates. what some term the "politics of difference" or "identity politics."36 Advocates of multicultural perspectives stress that claims based on rights should not be targeted at the individual alone as a unit of society but should also be established for groups (Bok 1995; Phillips 1999, 96). As Alan Wolfe and Jytte Klausen (2000) note, the multicultural substitution of the group for the individual can cast identity politics "as anti-liberal in tone and consequence." They caution, along with others, such as Susan Okin, the need for combining both individual and group norms. Identity politics, Okin argues, can successfully combine with liberal principles, if and when groups allow individual members to enter and exit at will, avoid essentialism by recognizing individual diversity within ascriptive groups, and accept common standards of citizenship embodied in rules of law by the society at large (Okin 1999; Wolfe and Klausen 2000). In other words, multiculturalism works when based on a paradoxical combination of the affirmation of individual equality and group difference. This research demonstrates that such combinations not only are possible, but are advantageous to the political inclusion of subordinate groups, thereby adding significant theoretical and empirical validation for the advocacy of multicultural policies within electoral, democratic nation-states.

APPENDIX: DEFINITIONS OF VARIABLES

(1) Women's share of parliamentary seats. Percentage of women elected to the main national legislative body (lower house if bicameral), as of 2000 or the nearest prior year to 2000, from the Inter-Parliamentary Union.

(2) Welfare group difference. Dummy variable: Presence or absence of at least one constitutional provision for special benefits, protections, or privileges to individuals because of welfare needs, such as mothers, fathers, children, the disabled, the ill, or the elderly. Examples of such provisions are that the state "shall make special efforts to ensure a secure standard of living, instruction and education for the young," "mothers shall receive support and protection before an after the birth of the child," and "to recognize and protect the family as a fundamental and vital social unit." Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Andorra, Angola, Argentina, Armenia, Australia, Austria, Azerbaijan, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Belarus, Belgium, Benin, Bolivia, Costa Rica, Croatia, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Eritrea, Estonia, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, Gabon, Gambia, Georgia, Germany, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Jordan, Kazakstan, Kuwait, Kyrgyzstan, Laos, Latvia, Lesotho, Libya, Liechtenstein, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Maceonia, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Mali, Malta, Marshall Islands, Mauritania, Mexico, Moldavia, Monaco, Mongolia, Mozambique, Namibia, Nepal, The Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, North Korea, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Russian Federation, Rwanda, Samoa, San Marino and Principe, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leon, Slovakia, Slovenia, Somalia, South Africa, South Korea, Spain, Sudan, Suriname, Sweden, Switzerland, Syria, Taiwan, Tajikistan, Thailand, Togo, Turkey, Turkmenistan, Uganda, Ukraine, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom, Uruguay, Uzbekistan, Vanuatu. Venezuela, Vietnam, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Zambia. (3) Monarchical group difference (open to women).

Brazil, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burma (Myanmar), Burundi.

Cambodia. Cameroon, Canada, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Congo.

Dummy variable: Presence or absence of constitutional provision for a monarchy open to women. Australia, Bahamas, Barbados, Belize, Canada, Denmark, Dominica, Grenads, Jamaica, Lesotho, Luxembourg, Monaco, The Netherland, New Zealand, Norway, Papua New Guinea, St. Lucia, St. Vincent and the Grenadines, Solomon Islands, Spain, St. Kitts and Nevis, Sweden, Thailand, Tonga, Trinidad & Tobago, Tuvalu, United Kingdom.

(4) Monarchical group difference (male only). Dummy variable. Belgium, Bhutan, Brunei Darussalam, Cambodia. Japan, Jordan, Kuwait, Liechtenstein, Malaysia, Morocco, Nepal, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Swaziland.

(5) Cultural group difference. Example of clauses coded: "It is the responsibility of the authorities of the State to create conditions enabling the Sami people to preserve and develop its language, culture and way of life." Dummy variable: Presence or absence of at least one constitutional guarantee for state benefits, protections, or privileges (including political representative quotas) because of cultural identity, race, language, or religion. Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Argentina, Armenia, Australia, Bangladesh, Belarus, Belgium, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Botswana, Burma (Myanmar), Cambodia, Cameroon, Canada, China, Colombia, Congo, Croatia, Cuba, Cypress, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, Gabon, Gambia, Georgia, Ghana, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Kenya, Kiribati, Kyrgyzstan, Laos, Latvia, Lebanon, Lithuania, Macedonia, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Mali, Malta, Marshall Islands, Mauritius, Micronesia, Moldova, Nepal, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Nigeria, North Korea, Norway. # Lipstick and Logarithms: Gender, Institutional Context, and Representative Bureaucracy

LAEL R. KEISER AND VICKY M. WILKINS University of Missouri—Columbia KENNETH J. MEIER Texas A&M University

ccording to the theory of representative bureaucracy, passive representation among public employees will lead to active representation in bureaucratic outputs. Existing research demonstrates that the link between passive and active representation exists for race but not for sex. Past research on this topic has not, however, taken into account the contextual environment that affects whether sex will translate into gender and lead to active representation in the bureaucracy. In this paper, we create a framework that specifies the conditions that affect whether passive representation results in active representation for sex and then test this framework using the case of education. We find that passive representation of women in education leads to active representation and that the institutional context affects the extent to which this link between passive and active representation occurs.

he women's movement has long sought to increase the number of women in leadership positions within government organizations. An assumption behind this goal is that increased access to positions of power (passive representation) will result in policies that improve the lives other women outside the organization (active representation). Is this assumption valid? Little empirical research exists that explores whether increasing the number of women in an organization affects the policy outputs of the organization. What little research there is shows no link between passive and active representation for gender (Hindera 1993; Selden 1997).

In this article, we create a theoretical framework that identifies the conditions under which gender diversity has a substantive effect on organizational outputs and tests whether the passive representation of women in education affects the performance of female students. Future researchers interested in diversity in other bureaucracies, legislatures, or courts can use this framework to explore whether diversity matters in different organizations and across policy areas.

Our findings for whether passive representation of women leads to active representation in education has implications for public policies seeking to increase the diversity of organizations such as affirmative action. If a link exists between passive and active representation for gender, then diversity, or the lack thereof, has distributive consequences that go beyond the equal opportunity of individual workers.

REPRESENTATIVE BUREAUCRACY

The literature on representative bureaucracy provides a rich foundation for our research. The premise underlying this research is that a representative bureaucracy is a good to be provided and that a bureaucracy broadly reflective of the interests, opinions, needs, desires, and values of the general public has a legitimate claim to participate in the policy process (Selden 1997). The existing research distinguishes between passive and active representation. Passive representation refers to the bureaucracy's demographic representativeness of a larger population (Mosher 1982). Active representation, in contrast, is defined as bureaucrats' advocacy of their constituents' interests, making policy decisions that benefit a given group among the agency's clientele, often by eliminating discriminatory barriers (Hindera 1993; Mosher 1982). Our research is concerned with understanding when passive representation leads to active representation for women. We ask, in the language of Hanna Pitkin (1967), When are female bureaucrats merely "standing for" women and when might we expect them to "act for" women?

Most research on active representation focuses on race and shows that minority bureaucrats frequently implement policies or use their discretion to reduce the disparate treatment minority clients have received historically from various public bureaucracies (Hindera 1993; Meier et al. 1989; Meier and Stewart 1992; Selden 1997). In contrast, research examining representation and the sex of the bureaucrats is limited and somewhat mixed in its results. The meager research that exists finds that passive representation for women clearly affects individuals within organizations (Duerst-Lahti and Johnson 1990; Kelly, Hale, and Burgess 1991) but has not found evidence that passive representation results in active representation of women in bureaucratic outputs (Hindera 1993; Selden 1997). In sum, prior research, sparse as it is, indicates that passive representation can lead to active representation for race but not for sex.

SEX, GENDER, AND IDENTIFICATION: FEMINIST THEORY

We are intrigued by these findings that race is a significantly more important factor than sex in affecting bureaucrats' actions and decisions. Surely sex is no less, if no more, central in shaping individuals' experiences in the world and, hence, in shaping political values. Why, then, would bureaucrats fail to translate passive representation into active representation on the basis of sex? Because representation is not a normal bureaucratic function, we need to know when female bureaucrats are likely to identify as women rather than as agency employees or a myriad of other roles. The central role of identity in representation logically leads us to work in feminist theory.

Feminist theory suggests that part of the answer to our question lies in the complicated relationship among politics, group identity, and sexual difference. As Simone de Beauvoir (1974, xxii) observed in 1949, "Women do not say 'We," for they lack a distinctive history, culture, or religion that both marks them off as a collective with internal similarities and differentiates them from others of their social class. In many ways, the history of second-wave feminism in the United States confirms de Beauvoir's point, for in the very process of articulating a feminist "We" through the practices of consciousness raising, feminists were confronted with the wide range of markers of difference that distinguish women from one another: race, class, sexuality—the list could go on and on. Could it be that, as some feminists have suggested, women compose a social collective definable only by recourse to a common biological sex (Daly 1978; O'Brien 1989)?

Defining women according to (supposed) biological similarities that remain constant over time runs afoul, however, of another foundational premise of secondwave feminist thought: the important distinction between sex and gender. Insofar as sex refers simply to the physiological reproductive capacities, gender describes the social and cultural interpretation of sex or, more precisely, the cultural magnification of sexual difference and commensurate suppression of similarities between women and men (Rubin 1975). The concept of gender helps feminists challenge limitations that are socially imposed upon women, limitations that are justified by reference to ascriptive characteristics said to follow from biological maleness or femaleness but that differ demonstrably across cultures, social classes, and historical eras. Put differently, gender evokes the social conventions that claim biological sex as their natural origin, marking the difference (for example) between biological femaleness and what counts as feminine in any given time or place. If sex is described as a binary variable (male or female), gender is more accurately thought of as designating a limitless range of possible interpretations of sex that coexist within a given society.<sup>1</sup>

SEX, GENDER, AND INSTITUTIONS

Our examination of feminist theory convinces us that the classic social scientists' variable of "sex," crucial as it is to any inquiry measuring the social distinctions between women and men, is simply not nuanced enough to capture fully the complexity of gender. Gender, not sex, is what matters for the purposes of social research (Duerst-Lahti and Kelly 1995), for it is the considerably more complicated concept of gender that tracks the political-institutional meanings that make "sex" socially relevant. By extracting "sex" from gender to distinguish female from male, scholars dispense with precisely what makes gender important to social science research—social meaning—and endow sexual difference with a constant and invariant quality that much feminist thinking about social identification and political action shows to be problematic. Of course, this presents something of a problem for social scientists, who, for the time being anyway, may be hard pressed to reconfigure their data so as to encode a schema more complicated than the stark binary, male/female, allows us to imagine. But this is not reason enough to abandon the effort to rethink how we treat gender, or processes of identification more generally, in empirical work. Certainly researchers can make data tell a more complex story about gender even when they are limited by the binaries of their data; and we suggest that a large part of that project is entailed in the process of interpreting the data or, more precisely, interpreting data in light of the larger institutional features that shape the circumstances in which bureaucrats exercise discretion and act to affect policy outcomes, in other words, in the ways that female bureaucrats identify as women and translate passive into active representation.

In this respect, some of the conceptual contributions of the new institutionalism are useful; this literature can focus our concern with processes of identification by reference to the possibilities opened and foreclosed by institutions themselves and, thus, help us to hone in on the institutional contexts in which identification is crystallized, enacted, sustained, contested, and transformed.2 Institutions work as "ligatures" that fasten competing and cooperating sites of political analysis (the state, the economy, and civil society) together with relationships among political actors and largescale processes (Katznelson 1997, 103). Political agents, including bureaucrats, are always embedded in institutional milieus; they are both shaped and constrained by the contingencies of context and circumstance (Immergut 1998; Katznelson 1997); and public policy is also influenced by the complex, often competing, dynamics fostered by the interaction of institutions (Orren and Skowronek 1994). Even more significant for our purposes here, institutions shape social actors' cognition by conferring identity—that is, by selecting the factors that are to be considered relevant in making decisions.<sup>3</sup> As Douglas (1986, 59) states, "Sameness [read identity] is not a quality that can be recognized in things themselves; it is conferred upon elements within a coherent scheme" worked out by institutions for institutional purposes and political ends.

Social institutions are important sites where sexual difference comes to be defined as salient to social identity, for they are the locations where gendered practices develop and are repeated, adapted, and sometimes transformed. Institutional structure is particularly important in shaping the behavior of individuals who work in bureaucracies because bureaucracies are not generally designed to serve a representative function for a particular clientele group. Institutional structures help to determine the purpose and scope of bureaucrats' work and how much discretion they have in carrying out their tasks. Hierarchy, control of information, standard operating procedures, and roles all work to keep individual behavior in line with the goals of the bureaucracy (Simon 1997). We cannot understand bureaucratic behavior without taking into account the institutions in which the behavior takes place. The power of bureaucracies to constrain individual behavior works against active representation because individuals engaging in an advocacy role within the organization must overcome institutional constraints to identify with clients who share their demographic characteristics (Meier 1993a). Institutional structures in the organization can work to highlight identity with the organization (Romzek 1990) and, in so doing, deemphasize identity based on demographic characteristics. According to Ferguson (1984, 18), hierarchy and roles in bureaucratic settings cause bureaucrats to de-emphasize their multiple identities and to increase the importance of their identity as members of the organization. Not surprisingly, research has found that the best predictor of bureaucratic attitudes is the agency for which an individual works, not his/her demographic characteristics (Meier and Nigro 1976; Mosher 1982).

Although institutional structure plays a large role in constraining the behavior of individuals working within it, bureaucracies cannot completely determine and control individual practices. Even with the power of hierarchy, managers of bureaucracies cannot completely circumscribe their subordinates' activities due to information asymmetry and goal conflict (Brehm and Gates 1997; Moe 1984). In fact, institutional structures and the individuals who inhabit the institution have a symbiotic relationship. The preferences and attitudes of individual bureaucrats work to shape institutional structures such as standard operating procedures and norms (Barnard 1938; Brudney et al. 2000).

Institutions supply the social context and meaning that marks the distinction between gender and sex. Insofar as a considerable body of feminist research in the social sciences demonstrates that gender plays an important role in shaping individual experience and perspective (Chodorow 1978; Gilligan 1982; Keller 1985; Young 1990), it stands to reason that bureaucratic institutions, too, are both the subjects and the objects of gendered practices: Institutions are the products of gendered behavior as well as the environment in which that behavior takes place and is (or can be) transformed.

While feminist scholars contend that gender matters, then, it is important to add that institutions matter as well, for it is within institutions that sex accrues social meaning and, thus, through institutional practices that gender becomes politically salient. Put differently, institutional, and institutionalized, practices constitute gender, and constitute gender as both mutable and malleable, shaping the circumstances in which a subject's political consciousness might crystallize around the question of gender and she might act to promote causes and interests associated with women. In short, attending to institutional contexts can help us develop richer interpretations of data that are otherwise limited by binary coding according to sex. Doing so enables us to develop a more nuanced understanding of how and when gender matters, of how and under what conditions female bureaucrats are likely to translate passive into active representation.

The null finding that there is no link between passive and active representation with respect to gender is flawed because it does not explicitly incorporate the institutional and political context of the bureaucratic experience into empirical analysis. The important question facing us is not necessarily whether passive gender representation leads to active representation, but under what conditions this link occurs (Kelly and Newman 2001)? In what follows we create a template that can be used to identify cases when we should expect passive representation to lead to active representation.

&lt;sup>2</sup> In more traditional public administration terms, identity is similar to what organizational theorists termed "role." The multiple and changing identities of an individual bureaucrat are similar to Simon's (1997, 158) contention that "an individual can assume a variety of roles when these are evoked by appropriate circumstances, each of which may interact only weakly with the others." See also Brudney et al. 2000.

&lt;sup>3</sup> For example, when an academic department is required to report the demographic distribution of its faculty according sex and race, distinctions of maleness or femaleness, and white or black, become salient. But when the same department is contracting with a caterer for its annual retirement banquet, other markers of difference—such as eating habits that distinguish vegetarians from carnivores—emerge as differences that matter.

FACTORS THAT FACILITATE ACTIVE REPRESENTATION FOR GENDER

Because institutional and political contexts matter, we should not expect active representation to occur in the case of gender across all bureaucratic settings. Past empirical tests of representative bureaucracy for sex, however, have paid little attention to identifying the context in which bureaucrats' gender identity plays a prominent role in how they perform their work. We seek to fill this gap in the literature by creating a framework that will identify cases where active representation is likely to occur and use this framework to generate and test hypotheses concerning the impact of gender representation on the bureaucratic outputs of education bureaucracies.

Two necessary, but not sufficient, conditions exist for active bureaucratic representation to occur. First, bureaucrats must have discretion in how they carry out their jobs. In bureaucracies where most decisions are dictated by rules, bureaucrats have few opportunities to shape outputs to reward a particular group (Meier 1993a). Second, a necessary condition for representative bureaucracy concerns the type of policy the organization produces. Researchers argue that for representative bureaucracy to occur, the policy issue must be salient to the demographic characteristic in question (Meier 1993a; Selden 1997). Certain policy outputs are salient to demographic characteristics such as gender, while other issues may not be. This definition does little, however, to help us differentiate the issues that are women's issues from those that are not.5

Intuitively we all can identify issues that have been defined as "women's issues." Intuition does little, however, to help us systematically identify policy issues that foster representative bureaucracy. As a group, women may have a distinct viewpoint on many policy issues, but they do not always do so. The content of women's issues is fluid and changes over time. It is not a constant (compare Dolan 2000 and Meier and Nigro 1976).

The fluid nature of what counts as women's issues makes it difficult, therefore, to identify a priori the issues for which we expect to find representative bureaucracy for gender unless we more clearly specify the necessary conditions for an issue to become gendered. We argue that a policy area can become gendered (1) because the policy directly benefits women as a class, (2) because the gender of the bureaucrat changes the client-bureaucrat relationship, or (3) because the issue has been defined as a women's issue through the political process.<sup>7</sup>

The most straightforward way to identify a women's issue is to determine whether the policy directly benefits women as a group as distinct from men. Policies such as equal pay and funding for women's health directly benefit women as a class. As such, they provide bureaucrats an opportunity to play a representative role by distributing benefits to women or by increasing overall benefits

The second way of identifying gender-salient issues is by exploring whether the gender of the bureaucrat influences the client-bureaucratic relationship. This is most important in street-level bureaucracies where the interaction between bureaucrat and client is crucial in determining policy outputs. When bureaucrats and clients share the same demographic characteristic, they often share the same life experiences (Thielemann and Stewart 1996). Some life experiences are shared by women and, for the most part, not shared by men. In the case of rape, for example, female victims may feel more comfortable working with female law enforcement bureaucrats, who may be more likely to respond productively and sympathetically.

In addition, women can have distinct perspectives on many policies that benefit not only women, but also children and men (social welfare policies for example). Research has found that gender matters to broader policy areas that do not benefit women exclusively, such as the use of force in foreign or domestic affairs, income redistribution, and consumer concerns (Hale and Kelly 1989). The political process of issue definition is such that an issue may be defined one way during one historical period but take on another meaning at another time in response to the work of social movements and interest group pressure (Rochefort and Cobb 1994). For example, in industrialized nations, certain kinds of policy concerns—pay equity, reproductive rights, domestic violence, child care, etc.—are perceived as women's issues, largely because these have been targeted by feminists as venues where the social construction of gender places women at a distinct disadvantage (in assigning to them primary responsibility for child care, for example) or subjects them to systematic discrimination. Such issues represent only a small portion of public policy matters that might, in different circumstances, come to be viewed as having a distinctive impact on women.8 We hypothesize that active representation will occur only in bureaucracies dealing with policy issues that cient for representative bureaucracy for gender to exist.

The terms gender and women are not synonymous. The paucity of representation of women in organizations does not make gender unimportant. Organizations without female representation are gendered to privilege the masculine. Because, historically, women have not been represented in organizations, gender diversity should give organizations a more "female" orientation. Therefore we are interested in issues salient to women as opposed to men. We refer to these issues as "gendered."

Of course behavior will vary among female bureaucrats. Not all women will take up the role of active representation even when an issue is gendered.

&lt;sup>8</sup> Selden's (1997) finding that passive representation does not lead to active representation for women is not surprising given the fact that the issue she studied, housing for farmers, is not a particularly gendered issue. The needs of farmers have not been on the feminist political agenda, nor do gender differences exist in public opinion concerning agricultural policy. Furthermore, the lack of high numbers of single female farmers make it unlikely that a street-level bureaucrat will feel that she can advocate for women by increasing aid to directly benefit women as a class, gendered policy issues and issues where the bureaucrats' gender identification changes the client-bureaucrat relationship.

Other institutional and contextual factors such as the mission of a given bureaucracy should influence the transfer of passive into active representation. Some bureaucracies create advocacy roles for bureaucrats in keeping with organizational missions (Selden 1997) by socializing individual bureaucrats to adopt organizational goals (March and Olson 1994; Romzek 1990; Simon 1947). If the bureaucracy has a mission of assisting a particular group, passive representation should lead seamlessly to active representation. Although bureaucrats who do not share the demographic characteristics of their clientele should also act as advocates (Downs 1966), those who do share the demographic characteristic(s) should be easier to incorporate into the agency's goals as a consequence of their common demographic predispositions toward these goals. We hypothesize that although mission is not a necessary condition, passive representation in terms of gender might be expected to lead to active representation when the leaders of the bureaucracy or the bureaucracy's historical mission focus on assisting women. Active representation will increase as passive representation increases in agencies with an advocacy mission but will not be as strong in agencies lacking this advocacy mission.9

Similar to mission, hierarchy will affect whether female bureaucrats become advocates. Some scholars argue that hierarchy by its very nature precludes representative bureaucracy. They argue that hierarchical organizations depersonalize relationships, making members less likely to identify with a group outside of the organization (Ferguson 1984). According to this line of thinking, hierarchical organizations cannot be feminist organizations (Firestone 1970; Gelb 1986). Accordingly, we should expect bureaucratic organizations to maintain the status quo even as they increase passive representation. We hypothesize that more hierarchical and centralized organizations will be less likely to link passive and active representation.

Although hierarchy in and of itself may weaken the link between passive and active representation, the Weberian view of bureaucracy suggests that the existence of hierarchy per se is less important than the question of who occupies the top of any hierarchy. Hierarchy gives control to those bureaucrats at the top of the organizational structure (Weber 1946). By this reasoning, when women gain access to upper levels of an organization, they should create an internal environment more conducive to representative advocacy. Researchers have found that stratification affects representative bureaucracy for race (Meier, Stewart, and England 1989). We hypothesize that as the number of women in supervisory positions increases, active representation will increase.

In addition, organizational theorists have argued that a numerical threshold is necessary for passive to be transformed into active representation (Meier 1993b; Thompson 1978). A critical mass may be needed for minorities to take an advocacy role (Kanter 1977). This leads to our next hypothesis: Organizations with a critical mass of women will be more likely to allow for active representation.

Professionalization also influences bureaucratic outputs. Professions compete with the bureaucracy in shaping individual bureaucrats' goals because professionals receive some of their rewards from a group outside of the bureaucracy. Incorporating professionals into bureaucracies incorporates their values into the bureaucracy (Eisner 1991; Hodges and Durant 1989; Meier 2000). If professionals who see advocacy for a particular group as their role dominate a bureaucracy, we should expect bureaucratic outputs to be distributed to benefit that group. Similar to mission, professionalization should affect all bureaucrats, not just female ones. However, because women may be more disposed toward engaging in active representation for women due to shared experience, we believe that greater professionalization will facilitate the translation of passive representation into active representation.<sup>10</sup>

This section has hypothesized that seven institutional/contextual factors affect the transformation of passive representation into active representation: discretion, the gendering of a given policy issue, mission/socialization, hierarchy, stratification, critical mass, and professionalization. Although active representation should not occur in any organization without discretion and a gendered policy issue, the influence of other factors will become more or less important depending on the specific organization studied.

THE EMPIRICAL CASE

Our neoinstitutional theory of representative bureaucracy and gender links the processes of identification with the representation of clientele. This section describes our empirical test of the theory using schools and educational performance. Looking at education systems, we examine how female math teachers affect female students' math scores and subsequently influence student aspirations. Any movement from the more general theory to specific tests of the theory will inevitably narrow the range of variation; in some cases, variables will become constants (that is, when a single type of agency is investigated, mission becomes a constant) or their variation will be truncated.

Theoretical Modifications

For bureaucratic representation to occur, the issue involved must be identified as a gendered one. Among the &lt;sup>9</sup> We believe that the historic lack of mission for advocating for women in the EEOC helps to explain the failure of passive representation to lead to active representation that Hindera (1993) finds in his analysis of EEOC activity in the 1980s. In future research we will explore this further.

Women may be more attracted to professions where advocacy is possible, such as social work or teaching.

most constant gender issues in education is that of math scores. Nationwide, a persistent gender gap exists, with girls scoring lower than boys on math tests (Strauss and Subotnik 1994). Performance on standardized math tests is in turn associated with continuing one's education, especially in fields that emphasize math or mathematical reasoning (Oakes 1990; Wilson and Boldizar 1990). Insofar as identifying an issue as gendered is a necessary environmental condition for representation, the matter of improving girls' math scores meets the standard of benefiting women as a class. By selecting the same type of agencies (schools) during the same time frame (1995–98), we have turned many of the other factors, including mission, into constants.

Within the organization, a second necessary condition for representative bureaucracy is that the bureaucrats in question have discretion to influence outcomes. This paper focuses on street-level bureaucrats: teachers, both female teachers in general and female math teachers in particular. The normal principal (in both senses of the term)-agent relationship provides greater advantages to the agent (i.e., the teacher) than in most other organizations. School systems vest a great deal of autonomy in these street-level personnel who come to the organization as trained professionals. Administrators only rarely visit individual classrooms and, thus, do not closely monitor the interactions between teacher and student. Administrative control is limited to issues such as textbooks used, whether lesson plans were filed, and access to instructional resources. While these are important factors, they have only modest effects on how a teacher conducts a class.

With this discretion female teachers could affect the math grades of female students in one of four ways.<sup>11</sup> First, female teachers aware of the math gap might spend additional time with and generate more positive reinforcement for girls when teaching math. Second, girls who do not have a female math teacher could still identify with one as a role model; this identification could result in a greater effort to succeed in math classes. Third, nonmath teachers might facilitate learning by encouraging students who run into difficulty. Although math teachers are in a better position to provide this encouragement, a student might identify more closely with another teacher with a different specialization. This might be specific and linked to math classes or general and linked to overall aspirations. Some of this influence could work through an informal advising process, or might require no personal contact at all. Fourth, female teachers may be more likely than male teachers to press schools to adopt policies that will encourage girls in fields where they have historically underperformed. Although there is evidence that both male and female teachers call on boys more often, allow boys to dominate classroom discussion, push boys for more information, and expect more from male students (Campbell 1991; Fennema and Leder 1990; Sadker and Sadker 1994), there is evidence that in math and science classrooms female teachers act as role models, enhance female students' performance, and warm the "chilly climate" (Angrist and Almquist 1975; Rothstein 1995; Stake and Granger 1978). Only one of these four methods of influence requires that an individual student come into contact with a specific math teacher in a classroom; the other three processes can work throughout the organization. This diffuseness of impact means that it must be studied at the organizational rather than the individual level. <sup>12</sup> Accordingly, schools serve as the units of analysis.

Within the organization, two of our institutional variables remain relevant—stratification and hierarchy; the other three are essentially constant across organizations—professionalization and socialization or operate at well above minimum levels—critical mass. Hierarchically, school systems are extremely flat organizations with discretion vested in street-level personnel. Despite the general flat structure, school districts vary, with some being more decentralized. Our measure of decentralization is the span of control at the street level, that is, the ratio of the number of teachers to the total number of administrators in the organization. As this variable increases, administrators supervise more teachers, with the logical result that the time available to supervise any one teacher will decline. The mean span is 14, with a standard deviation of five.

Despite the preference for flat organizational forms, school districts are highly stratified by sex and can be considered classic glass-ceiling organizations. Fully 75% of teachers in Texas schools are female, but only 27% of supervisors (principals, assistant principals, and assistant superintendents) and only 8.4% of superintendents are. These data provide us with a measure of stratification—the percentage of female administrators.

The concept of a critical mass plays a role when any group has limited access to the organization (see Kanter 1977; Meier 1993b). Both female teachers (75%) and female math teachers (68%) constitute a majority of their classification. These figures should be well above what constitutes a critical mass, thus rendering the concept inapplicable for teachers (but not for administrators, see below).

In general terms, both professionalization and socialization should be relatively similar across these organizations. Teachers have a common educational background, and they serve a general instructional role within the organization. Individual schools of education might make a teacher more aware of gender issues, and some schools might encourage the development of a representation role; however, data on these factors are not available. In general, the professionalization and socialization of individuals across these organizations should be more similar than different.

&lt;sup>12</sup> Analysis at the individual level might also miss influences that persist through time. If the impact of an individual teacher persists, then studies conducted in later years are unlikely to capture that influence.

The Texas Case

Our specific case is 607 Texas high schools from 1995 to 1998. Because many of the data exist only at the district level, we were able to move our unit of analysis to the school level by restricting the analysis to single high school districts (we replicated this analysis with data at the district level and found similar results). Except for the eighth grade math test, all data were measured at the high school level. The Texas case provides an ideal setting for our study for two reasons. First, Texas has statewide standardized tests and an elaborate database that permits analysis by sex. Second, the Texas set of schools is extremely diverse in terms of race, ethnicity, resources, urban location, and other factors that affect education performance. The diversity of these schools suggests that findings from Texas should also apply to other educational systems as well as to organizations with similar characteristics (highly professionalized organizations with discretion vested in street-level bureaucrats). If Texas differs from other states, it is because educational performance has consistently been a salient issue for the past 15 years and because expenditures have increased more rapidly in Texas than in the nation as a whole.

Dependent Variables

Texas requires standardized tests of all students in grades 3, 5, 6, 7, and 8 as well as an exit exam. Our first dependent variables are the percentage of female students who pass the math exams in grade 8 and the exit exam. The literature suggests that math scores diverge only in junior and senior high when girls face the choice between lipstick and logarithms (Fennema and Sherman 1977; Meece and Parsons 1982; Oakes 1990; Strauss and Subotnik 1994). In Texas, boys' and girls' math scores are essentially the same in grades 3 through 8, but boys' pass rates exceed girls' by 4.1 percentage points on the exit exam.

Performance on standardized tests is a hurdle along the way to educational achievement. Students who perform poorly on such exams may also perform poorly on others or might reduce their overall educational aspirations. To investigate these phenomena in the context of representative bureaucracy, four other dependent variables are examined—average SAT scores, average ACT scores, the percentage of students who score above 1110 on the SAT or its equivalent on the ACT, and the successful completion of advanced placement exams (for which college credit is given). Girls in Texas score higher than boys on the ACT (16.8 vs. 15.2) and are more likely to pass advanced placement classes (15.7% vs. 14.1%) but score well below boys on SAT exams (933 vs. 962) and are less likely to break the 1,110 standard (16.8% vs. 18.3%). The lower SAT scores are not a function of more girls taking the test; correlations between the number of test takers and the average scores approach 0 when more than 30% of students take the exam. The correlation in this data set where 46% of students take the SAT is only 0.08, and that disappears with a control for poverty.

Control Variables

In addition to the key independent variables (female math teachers or female teachers, hierarchy and stratification), two sets of controls are used—one set for the task difficulty facing the organization and the other for organizational resources. Task difficulty reflects the truism that some students are easier to educate than others. The literature consistently finds that poverty and race are correlated with greater education problems (Jencks and Phillips 1998). Poverty and race are associated both with a lack of educational resources in the home and with other factors (e.g., single-family households) that affect student learning. The three specific measures are the percentage of black students, the percentage of Latino students, and the percentage of poor students (measured as students eligible for free school lunch programs). Each of these control variables should be negatively related to student performance.

The relationship between resources and student performance is controversial (Hanushek 1996; Hedges and Greenwald 1996). Recent research using well-crafted longitudinal data sets and well-designed experiments, however, generally shows that additional resources are associated with higher student performance (Evans, Murray, and Schwab 1997; Wenglinsky 1997). Two measures of resources are included—average teacher salary and average class size. Teacher salaries should be positively related to student performance, and class size should be negatively related to performance. <sup>13</sup>

Because our data are pooled (four years and 607 schools), we also include a set of control variables to deal with the time series aspect of the data set. Dummy variables for individual years were included in each equation. These dummy variables were always jointly significant, reflecting the overall positive trends in the student performance. To deal with the other source of problems related to pools, we assessed the cross sections of each equation for heteroscedasticity. Levels of heteroscedasticity were modest, and using robust standard errors had little impact on the findings presented here.

FINDINGS

The two regressions for girls' math scores are given in Table 1. The results are consistent with expectations. Female math teachers are positively associated with girls' math scores in grade 8 and on the exit exam. For grades 3, 5, and 6 the relationships are not statistically different from zero (results not shown). These findings are consistent with the literature that finds that sex differences in math performance do not arise until junior high. At lower grade levels where there are no sex differences, the sex of math teachers appears to be irrelevant. <sup>14</sup> In junior high and senior high, female

We also estimated these equations using median family income and percentage of the population living in poverty. Neither variable was statistically significant in the presence of the other control variables. Including these variables did not affect the other relationships found. The lack of relationship at the elementary levels makes sense also given the key independent variable—math teachers. Math teachers math teachers are associated with higher math scores for girls even when controlling for other factors.

On the math exit exam, a one percentage point increase in female math teachers is associated with a 0.055 percentage point increase in the girls' pass rate, all other things being equal. While this appears to be a relatively modest relationship, in fact, a one-standard deviation change in the percentage of female math teachers is associated with a change equivalent to 25% of the gap between boys' and girls' math scores. While the sex of math teachers is clearly not the most important factor in math education, reductions of this size would be substantively important and well worth pursuing. The control variables' relationships are all consistent with expectations.

Representation is a process that should be affected by institutional factors. In this case, both hierarchy and stratification vary. Female math teachers should be most likely to act in ways to benefit female students in organizations with low levels of hierarchy and high numbers of female administrators.

Table 2 examines the math exit exam and splits our districts according to the key institutional variables (we split the data rather than use interaction effects to avoid the massive collinearity generated by interaction terms). Regressions are run for hierarchical and nonhierarchical organizations (span of control greater than 14) and for organizations with more and less female administrators (25% cut point).16 Our institutional hypothesis is that the impact of female math teachers should increase (that is, the regression coefficient should increase) in flat organizations and in organizations with more female administrators. The results are mixed. The teachers' slope increases for flat organizations, but the difference is not statistically significant. For female administrators the relationship is statistically significant, but the difference is in the wrong direction. These mixed findings may be explained by the nature of math instruction, which is highly specific and rife with discretion. Organizations may be likely to find it difficult to modify a process that is characterized by extremely high levels of information asymmetry and few opportunities for observation.

Although math exams are a relatively narrow slice of public school curricula, they have long-term implications for building human capital. Table 3 relates math exit exams to average SAT scores (the verbal and math total; individual tests are not available). Several findings are relevant. First, math exit scores are positively correlated with SAT scores; all things equal, a onepercentile increase in the pass rate is associated with a 0.95 point increase on the SAT (about 15.8 points for a one-standard deviation change). Second, math teachers affect SAT scores only indirectly via their impact on the math exam. Third, female teachers in general, however, are associated with a substantial increase in female SAT scores; a one-percentile increase in female teachers is associated with an increase of 2.0 points on the SAT (about 17 points for a one standard deviation change), all other things equal.

The results in Table 3 suggest a slight change in focus to female teachers in general and to indicators of math scores when there are no "math" teachers. <sup>15</sup> The 25% figure would hold if boys were not affected by having a woman math teacher. In fact, boys' scores are also improved by having a woman math teacher but not as much as girls' scores are. This means that the gap would not close this quickly. The illustration is provided as a way of judging the substantive size of the impact, not on closing the gap per se. The impact of female math teachers on boys' scores is an important issue substantively and theoretically. When boys' scores on any of the indicators are included in these models, the results are weaker but generally hold up. We present the models without boys' scores because our theory contends that representation will generate benefits for the represented clientele; it does not argue that the represented will benefit more than other clientele.

Math is not a designated elementary certification in Texas. In short, math teachers are unlikely to affect math scores when there are no "math" teachers.

college aspirations. Because the influence of female teachers is likely to be diffused through out the organization, the institutional factors in our theory—hierarchy and stratification—in this case, are also more likely to come into play. The next two tables examine SAT scores, ACT scores, high exam scores, and passing advanced placement exams and how the relationships between these variables and female teachers are structured by hierarchy and stratification. Again, our working hypothesis is that the influence of female teachers will be enhanced in decentralized organizations and organizations with women in positions of administrative authority.

Table 4 shows how hierarchy interacts with female teachers to affect female student performance. The second column of the table shows that female teachers are positively associated with outcomes for female students on all four indicators. With regard to the interaction with structure, our hypothesis is that women teachers will have a greater impact in relatively flat organizations (those with a span of control over more than 14). In flatter organizations, a one-percentage point increase in female faculty is associated with a 3.36-point gain on the SAT, substantially more than the corresponding 0.85point gain for more hierarchical organizations. Similarly for ACT scores, the slope for female teachers is more than three times higher in flat organizations than in the others. At the high end of the scale, that is, scores above 1,110 on the SAT or its ACT equivalent, a onepercentile increase in female teachers correlates with a 0.37-percentage point increase in high-performing students in flat organizations; in other organizations, the relationship is essentially zero. Finally, the strongest comparison exists for advanced placement classes. A one-percentage point increase in female teachers is linked to 0.89 percentage point more female students taking and passing advanced placement exams in flat organizations; again, in other organizations the relationship is essentially zero. All four differences between the sets of slopes are statistically significant at the 0.05 level; in every case, active representative is greater in less hierarchical organizations.

In Table 5 the relationship between high levels of female administrators and the representation function of female teachers is probed. The hypothesis is that a larger number of female administrators should permit female teachers to be more active representatives for their female students. In every case, the slope coefficient for female teachers is larger in organizations with more than 25% female administrators than it is in the other organizations. In three of the four cases (the exception is ACT scores), the relationship is significant at the .05 level (one tail test). In the ACT case, the difference between the two coefficients barely misses statistical significance.

Overall our findings in Tables 4 and 5 show eight of the eight relationships to be consistent with the institutional hypotheses about representative bureaucracy (seven of eight if one counts only statistically significant differences). If there were no relationships between structure and representation, the probability that we could get eight of eight relationships in a predicted direction is less than .004 (for seven or more of eight the probability is .035).<sup>17</sup>

CONCLUSION

According to our framework, public education meets the necessary conditions for the transfer of passive representation to active representation for women. Consistent with our theory, passive representation does lead to active representation for gender in public education. An increase in passive representation for female math teachers and for female teachers in general correlates with educational benefits for girls. The level of passive representation for women in the bureaucracy has consequences for the policy benefits the bureaucracy produces for women. In contrast to past research, our findings suggest that the link between passive and active representation can exist for gender, as well as race. These findings support the assertion that the benefits of diversity go beyond providing equal opportunity to individuals. Some have critiqued policies such as affirmative action as providing benefits solely to middle-class women (Gilliam 1995). Our findings suggest, however, that increasing the diversity of bureaucratic organizations for sex has implications for female clients of the bureaucracy, many of whom are not middle-class.

Our findings also support our contention that institutional context affects whether passive representation will lead to active representation. The findings show consistent support that stratification and hierarchy play an important role. In schools with more female administrators, female teachers were associated with higher ACT, SAT, and advanced placement rates for girls. For hierarchy, the representative process also worked better for girls in less hierarchical organizations. Clearly, stratification and hierarchy are important institutional variables that affect whether passive representation will lead to active representation. For those seeking to increase active representation on the basis of gender, attention must be paid to not only increasing overall passive representation but also the structure of the organization and the representation at upper levels of the organization. Institutional barriers that create glass ceilings for women have policy consequences that go beyond the lack of opportunity for individual women.

This study is the first to find that passive bureaucratic representation translates into active representation for women, and thus it sheds some light on an old puzzle, namely, why previous research has uncovered a strong association between passive and active representation where race is concerned but no relationship at all where gender is the object of scrutiny. Race and gender are of interest to students of representative bureaucracy precisely insofar as they accrue political meaning within institutions. While scholars in the field have long been attentive to the ways in which race is institutionally defined, they have been less careful in their considerations of gender. 18 Scholars who rely exclusively on "sex"—that is, on data encoded according to the binary "male/female"—without accounting for the ways in which these designations acquire meaning within institutions (and public life more generally) miss precisely what it is that makes gender political. This is to say that they miss the very factors that are likely to move women working within bureaucracies to act to reduce institutionalized biases against women, individually and collectively. We attribute our unique positive results to our efforts to wed our neoinstitutional framework with the insights of feminist theory. This study is, however, only the first step in a reformulation of the theory of representative bureaucracy and women.

To explore fully whether passive representation leads to active representation for women in the bureaucracy, researchers must examine a variety of cases. We hope that the framework presented in this analysis will provide guidance in terms of the cases where we should look for gender representation. Thus far, little attention has been paid to identifying cases where, theoretically, gender representation should occur and where it should not. The case of education suggests that passive representation can lead to active representation for gender. Future research is needed, however, to verify whether this will occur across policy areas that meet our necessary conditions. Once we select cases where opportunities exist for representative bureaucracy, additional empirical tests can be conducted to determine whether the institutional variables we have identified matter.

Self-Interest, Social Security, and the Distinctive Participation Patterns of Senior Citizens

ecades of participation research show that political activity increases with income, but the participation of senior citizens specifically with regard to Social Security poses an exception to this pattern. Social Security-oriented participation decreases as income rises, in part because lower-income seniors are more dependent on the program. The negative income-participation gradient is especially pronounced for letter writing about the program, but even Social Security-related voting and contributing are less common among higher-income seniors. This is an instance in which self-interest is highly influential: Those who are more dependent are more active. It is also an example of lower-class mobilization with regard to an economic issue, something quite unusual in the United States.

t is well established that political participation increases with income, even for activities in which income seems irrelevant, such as voting, or counterintuitive, such as protesting (e.g., Rosenstone and Hansen 1993; Verba and Nie 1972; Verba, Schlozman, and Brady 1995). Verba, Schlozman, and Brady (1995) suggest several reasons for this pattern. Income is a politically relevant and fungible resource that directly or indirectly facilitates activity; the affluent are more highly engaged with public affairs, as they typically have more at stake in a variety of policy areas; and higher-income individuals are more frequently recruited to political activity. In the United States, which lacks strong labor unions and socialist parties, lower-income citizens are less mobilized, especially on economic issues.

Political activity concerning Social Security may, however, be different. Social Security is not only an economic issue but also a government program. Rather than personalize or "morselize" their fate as in many other domains, citizens can attribute their well-being to government action (Lane 1962, 353; see Sears and Funk 1990). Moreover, political activity is seen as an appropriate vehicle for expressing dissatisfaction or concern about the policy and its operation. Because the program is self-contributory, no welfare stigma or moral bar discourages political activism on the issue, as is the case with other government programs benefiting lowincome individuals. More importantly, Social Security is unlike many issues in that the stakes are greater for lower-income recipients, who derive a larger portion of their income from the program. The usual incomeinterest gradient is reversed. Accordingly, participation based on Social Security may be greater among lower-income than among higher-income seniors, a reversal of the typically positive income-participation relationship.

Poorer seniors may seem incapable of participating at high rates, given their low resources. However, several characteristics of seniors and their programs make their unusual activity concerning Social Security possible. Seniors' resources are offset in a variety of ways and less detrimental to their participation than low resources are to the participation of nonseniors. Also, the political parties mobilize low-income seniors at the same rate as higher-income seniors, and moderate-income elders at even higher rates, again different from the usual pattern, where mobilization increases with income.

A negative relationship between income and participatory activity concerning Social Security would be important in several regards. It would represent an exception to a long-standing regularity in behavioral research—that political participation is more common. among the affluent. It would be a rare example of selfinterest exerting a significant influence on individual behavior, since the most dependent are hypothesized to be the most active. Finally, this case would add another example to the small but growing literature on the effects of policy on the political behavior and attitudes of mass publics (e.g., Mettler 1998; Mettler and Welch 2001; Soss 1999). Social Security may democratize senior participation by raising the activity levels of lowerincome seniors relative to the affluent for the portion of seniors' participation that concerns Social Security.

INCOME AND PARTICIPATION IN AMERICA

Decades of research amply illustrate the higher political participation rates of the affluent and offer several explanations for the traditionally positive relationship between income and political activity. Perhaps the most obvious is that income is a necessary resource for some activities, such as making campaign contributions. Even beyond that, political participation is a luxury good more readily available to higher-income citizens. The affluent are not preoccupied with securing the necessities of daily life and can purchase the labor of others such as gardeners and babysitters to free their time (e.g., Conway 1991, 25; Milbrath and Goel 1977, 98; Rosenstone 1982). They can "simply afford to do more—of everything—than citizens with little money," including political participation (Rosenstone and Hansen 1993, 12).

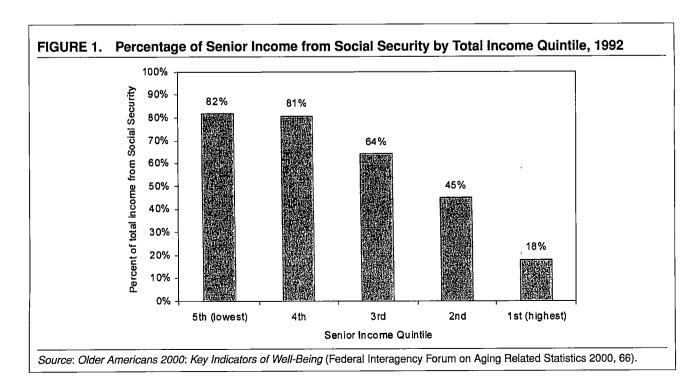

Efforts to recruit citizens to political activity also tend to focus on the affluent. In Europe, socialist parties and labor unions mobilize the lower class, in some countries to levels of political activity rivaling those of the middle class (Powell 1986; Verba, Nie, and Kim 1978). In the United States, in contrast, no laborbased political party emerged in the early twentieth century (Skocpol 1995, 26), and labor unions have been relatively weak. Contemporary mobilization techniques such as direct mail and door-to-door canvassing are directed predominantly toward highstatus individuals and neighborhoods (Rosenstone and Hansen 1993). Low-income Americans are rarely mobilized to political activity, except by religious institutions, which typically focus on moral rather than economic issues (Verba, Schlozman, and Brady 1995).

Finally, income affects participation by enhancing individuals' engagement with politics and sense of stake in the system. Higher-income people have a greater stake in many policy areas. Perhaps the best example is tax policy, where those with high incomes have more to win or lose. Affluent homeowners, for example, were more likely than other Californians to support Proposition 13, the 1978 property tax rollback initiative, because of the large tax savings the measure promised them (Sears and Citrin 1982). High-income individuals are also more likely to perceive their great stake; their political interest is stimulated by their high-level jobs, in which they learn how government affects their business and personal lives (Conway 1991). Additionally, they belong to voluntary organizations at high rates. These institutional affiliations provide civic skills, recruitment opportunities, and proximity to other active individuals who both share information about issues and enforce participatory norms (Verba, Schlozman, and Brady 1995).

Thus, resource, engagement, and mobilization factors all contribute to the higher participation rates of the affluent. The positive relationship between income and political participation is so pervasive that it appears even in explanations of political activity among disadvantaged groups. Black and Latino political activists, for example, have higher incomes and are less likely to receive government assistance than the groups from which they are drawn (Verba, Schlozman, and Brady 1995, chap. 8). The resource mobilization theory of social movements argues that groups with higher levels of resources are more likely to overcome collective action problems and engage in political activity (McCarthy and Zald 1977). Next to education, income is the political resource most important in explaining both conventional and unconventional activity.

SOCIAL SECURITY AND SENIOR PARTICIPATION

For most participatory activities, income operates in the same way for senior citizens: Affluent seniors are more politically active (Campbell 2000). However, in the context of Social Security, income plays a different role-it is an indicator not of "resources" but of "dependence on government transfers." As shown in Figure 1, poorer seniors derive a higher portion of their income from Social Security. Seniors in the lowest two quintiles get over 80% of their income from the program, compared to just 18% for the highest quintile. Because the stakes in this issue area are greater for lower-income seniors, they should exhibit more interest in Social Security than their more affluent counterparts, and they should be more likely to engage in Social Security-based participation. In this issue domain income measures dependence rather than participatory capacity, and the usually positive relationships between income and political interest and participation are reversed.

Not all political activities would be equally affected. A negative income—participation relationship is most likely for letter writing about Social Security. Citizen-initiated, issue-specific, and independent of the electoral cycle, letter writing is the chief means by which seniors can voice their concerns about Social Security. This activity might include particularized casework requests to solve individual problems, more generalized statements of policy concern, or objections to deleterious reform proposals. In any of these instances, letter writing is the participatory vehicle by which specific issue concerns can be raised, and lower-income seniors should be more likely to write such letters.

There may be spillover effects on voting and contributing as well. For these acts, however, the income-participation relationship is unlikely to be monotonically negative, as is the case with Social Security-based contacting. Contacting is a "purer" act: Letters are usually about a specific topic, so survey respondents' assertions that they wrote about Social Security are probably accurate. In contrast, individuals vote and contribute for a variety of reasons, and so Social Security-based voting and contributing may be "contaminated" by other issues. Since the incomeparticipation relationship around these other issues is positive, the relationship between income and reported Social Security-based participation will not be monotonically negative. In addition, contributing requires disposable income, suggesting a curvilinear relationship for that activity, with moderate-income seniors who are concerned about Social Security being more likely to contribute with the program in mind than either low-income seniors who cannot afford to or high-income seniors who are not interested in doing so.

DATA AND METHODS

Three data sets are necessary to test these hypotheses about seniors' interest in Social Security and their participation concerning the program and to describe their pattern of political party mobilization, as no single data set contains all of these dependent variables. Roper Survey 8108 (Roper Organization 1981) asked respondents how closely they follow news of various topics.<sup>1</sup> I use this data set to assess seniors' interest in Social Security compared to other domestic and international issues. The 1990 Citizen Participation Study (Verba et al. 1995) provides the Social Security-based participation items. Program recipients were asked whether they had ever contacted an elected official to complain about Social Security payments, taken into account a candidate's position on Social Security in deciding how to vote, or made a campaign contribution based at least in part on concern about Social Security payments. Finally, party mobilization is measured in the 1996 National Election Study, where respondents were asked whether someone from a political party contacted them during the election season.

The Citizen Participation Study items measuring Social Security-based participation require a closer look. Not only do the activities themselves differ in their "purity," as noted above, but also the survey items measuring Social Security-based participation vary in the locus of self-interest. With Social Security-based contacting, the self-interest is in the motivation to write a letter; a senior citizen depends on the program, experiences a problem with benefits or feels concern about a proposed policy change, and chooses to write a letter to an elected official to request assistance or to express the policy concern. The hypothesized relationship is between income and a particular kind of participation, and this participation is higher among lower-income seniors. Social Security-based voting and contributing are a bit different. The question wording for Social Security-based voting places the self-interest not in the motivation to vote, but in vote choice. The item measures (1) whether a respondent voted and (2) whether the respondent felt that Social Security figured into the vote choice. Social Security-based contributing is also a dependent variable with two parts: the act of contributing and the attribution of the motive to Social Security. Thus for voting and contributing in the context of Social Security, the relationship is not between income and a certain kind of participation, as with Social Security-based contacting, but between income and a propensity to attribute the primary motivation to Social Security. However, while these distinctions are important to note, affluent seniors should nonetheless be least likely to engage in these acts, whether the dependent variable is contacting with Social Security in mind or attributing a vote decision or political contribution to concern with the program. The relationship between income and each type of Social Security-based participation should be different from that between income and non-Social Security-based participation.

In each analysis, the dependent variable is modeled as a function of income, education, gender, race, marital status, work status, and age (where available). Income is represented curvilinearily by the inclusion of a squared term except where tests for multicollinearity indicated that income-squared was redundant with income. The models are estimated with ordinary least squares (OLS) or, where the outcome is dichotomous, logistic regression. "Seniors" are respondents aged 65 and over, and "nonseniors" are ages 18 to 64.

SENIORS' PARTICIPATORY CAPACITY

Before testing the hypotheses about the greater propensity of lower-income seniors to be interested in Social Security and to engage in Social Security-based participation, it is necessary to discuss whether seniors, particularly the less affluent, have sufficient means to participate. Resources such as education and income are among the strongest predictors of participatory activity (Verba, Schlozman, and Brady 1995), yet senior citizens have the lowest formal education and household income of any age group. One-third of seniors in the Citizen Participation Study lack a high school diploma, compared to only 9% of respondents aged 35 to 49. The average family income for seniors is just over $24,000, compared to almost $46,000 for those aged 35 to 49.

Despite their low resource levels, however, senior citizens in the United States participate at very high rates. In the 1996 National Election Study, seniors were 7% more likely to vote than 35 to 64 year olds, and 27% more likely to vote than persons under 35. Twelve percent of seniors made campaign contributions, compared to 9% of the middle age group and just 3% of the youngest group.

Seniors' active participation suggests that their modest resource levels are counterbalanced in several ways. With retirement, one trades one politically relevant resource, income, for another, free time. Seniors report over 12 hours of free time per day, compared to five hours for respondents aged 35 to 49.2 Also, seniors' incomes "go further" than those of nonseniors. Seniors do spend a greater share of their income on health care—12% of their before-tax income, compared to 5% among all households in 1997—but spend less than nonseniors, both in absolute terms and as a percentage of income, in categories such as entertainment, apparel, transportation, and, most notably, personal taxes and mortgage costs (U.S. Bureau of the Census 1999, 471). Seniors also hold less nonmortgage consumer debt (Duensing 1988). They benefit from a variety of financial breaks that are conferred on the basis of age rather than a means test: They are exempt from Social Security and Medicare taxes on earnings; they get an extra deduction on their federal income taxes; they pay taxes on a smaller share of their incomes; and they receive discounts at many retail stores, restaurants, hotels, and so on.<sup>3</sup> The mean senior family income is just 53% that of 35 to 49 year olds in the Citizen Participation Study, but adjusting for household size brings seniors' per capita income to 88% that of the younger group.

That seniors have low education levels may be even less relevant for participation than their low incomes since education relative to one's cohort is what matters for many participatory activities (Nie, Junn, and Stehlik-Barry 1996). But even seniors' low absolute levels of formal education are offset in several ways. To some extent, life experience may serve as a substitute for formal education (Wolfinger and Rosenstone 1980). Over a lifetime one may absorb participatory norms and values, learn to process political information, and become accustomed to voting through sheer habit (Plutzer 2002; Weisberg and Grofman 1981); a long life in the "school of hard knocks" may impart the same experience with bureaucratic relationships

Thus low resources do not represent the same bar to senior political activity as to nonsenior activity. Many seniors, even the less affluent, have sufficient resources to act on their great interest in Social Security, to which I now turn.

RESULTS

Political Interest

In Roper Survey 8108, respondents were asked whether they follow news of various domestic and international issues closely, follow it casually, or pay no attention. Eighty-one percent of seniors said that they follow news of Social Security closely, compared to 54% of nonseniors. Seniors followed news of Social Security more closely than any other topic. Indeed, the highest level of interest shown by any age group in any issue was seniors' interest in Social Security.<sup>6</sup>

To examine how the dependence gradient influences interest in Social Security, I modeled interest in that helps educated people overcome the procedural hurdles necessary to register and vote (Wolfinger and Rosenstone 1980, 35–36, 60). There may also be cohort differences in education content and quality. Earlier cohorts may have been more steeped in democratic, "American" values in school (Rosenstone and Hansen 1993). Perhaps greater education quality explains why seniors score as high as the more educated 35 to 49 year olds on the Citizen Participation Study vocabulary test. Lack of formal education may also be offset by voluntary group and church memberships. Seniors belong to these groups at the same rates as, or higher rates than, younger people and practice many politically relevant skills such as letter writing and speech making. 5

&lt;sup>5</sup> In the Citizen Participation Study, respondents were asked whether they had engaged in the following activities in the last six months as part of their job, organizational involvements, or church activities: written a letter, come to a meeting where they took part in making decisions, planned or chaired a meeting, or given a presentation or speech. The job skill questions were asked of those who were employed. The church skill questions were asked of those who were active members of their churches or who had served on their church board in the past five years. The organization skill questions were asked of respondents' "main" organization, and only skills exercised in nonpolitical organizations are analyzed here (see Verba, Schlozman, and Brady 1995, Appendix B.9, for further explanations of the skills variables). Seniors are just as likely to belong to nonpolitical organizations as 35 to 49 year olds (74 to 72%) and practice the same number of skills there, 1.3 of a possible four. Seniors are even more likely to be members of a religious institution or to attend religious services two or more times per month—79%, vs. 67% of 35 to 49 year olds—and, again, practice as many skills, 1.6 on average. Only 10% of seniors work, and the survey did not ask about skills acquired on the job before retirement.

&lt;sup>6</sup> Senior interest in Social Security remains strong contemporarily. In the 1998 midterm election exit poll administered by the Voter News Service, seniors were most likely to cite Social Security as the issue that mattered most in deciding their vote for the House of Representatives (Toner 1999, A10). Thirty-one percent of seniors chose Social Security as the issue that mattered most, followed by "moral and ethical standards" (20%), education (14%), taxes (11%), the economy/jobs (10%), health care (8%), and the Clinton/Lewinsky matter (6%). The "most important problem" mentioned most frequently among seniors in the 2000 NES was Social Security; among nonseniors, it was education.

&lt;sup>2</sup> In the Citizen Participation Study, free time is defined as time not spent working, doing housework, studying, or sleeping. The largest difference between seniors and nonseniors is time spent working. Retired senior men have even more free time, 14 hours per day.

&lt;sup>3</sup> The median senior couple with an income of $25,000 would owe $294 in federal taxes, or 1.15%, whereas the median nonsenior couple with an income of $45,000 would owe $5,164, or 11.5%. On an income of $40,000, seniors would pay $2,664, or 6.6%, in federal taxes, compared to $4,414 or 11.0% for nonseniors (Moon and Mulvey 1996, 25).

domestic topics, international topics, and Social Security as a function of income and other covariates. I scored interest in Social Security as a dichotomous variable—one for those following news of the program closely, zero for those following it casually or not at all—and estimated the model with logistic regression. I constructed scales for interest in domestic and international issues by adding the number of issues each respondent followed closely (zero to five), which I recoded to zero to one and estimated with OLS.

Figure 2 shows the effect of income on issue interest among seniors with the other covariates held to their means. Interest in domestic and international issues increases with income, the traditional pattern.

In contrast, interest in Social Security falls at high income levels. Strictly, I predicted a monotonically negative income—interest relationship, while the results here are curvilinear. It could be that the income variable in the Roper data picks up some of the (positive) effects of education even when education is controlled for.

 $^7$  A factor analysis on the news items produces two scales, with the domestic issues (prices, income taxes, interest rates, air traffic controllers' strike, and the Conoco buyout) producing one scale with a Cronbach's  $\alpha$  of .58 and international issues (royal wedding, Arab-Israeli relations, Polish situation, English riots, Irish hunger strikes) producing another with a Cronbach's  $\alpha$  of .75.

Alternatively, it may be that self-interest is a weaker influence on attitudes than participation, for acting on an issue is more costly than voicing an opinion on a survey, and so typically only the self-interested act (Citrin and Green 1990). In any case, even with issue interest, Social Security has a different pattern vis-à-vis income than other domestic and international issues. These effects are even more pronounced in participation.

Political Participation

Table 1 shows the three types of Social Security-based participation modeled as a function of income, incomesquared, and other covariates. As hypothesized, income has a negative influence on contacting based on Social Security, the opposite of its usual sign (column 2). The relatively small number of cases prevents the coefficient for income from achieving statistical significance itself, but a log likelihood test shows that income and income-squared are jointly significant (p < .001). Figure 3a illustrates the probability by income that a senior citizen will write a letter complaining about Social Security, and it falls precipitously, in great contrast to the typically positive income-participation gradient.

As predicted, the results for Social Security-based voting and contributing are somewhat different. The likelihood of voting on the basis of Social Security first rises with income and then decreases at higher income levels (Figure 3b). If the Social Security voting item truly measured only Social Security-oriented voting and was not contaminated by other issues (people vote for many reasons even when they say they voted with regard to Social Security), the line would drop

The news interest items are ordinal variables. I could have estimated each with ordered logit, but I wanted to combine the domestic and international items, and doing so other than by this method would impose a metric on them. While scoring close interest as 1 and casual or no interest as 0 loses some information, the basic result—that interest in domestic and international issues rises with income while interest in Social Security falls at higher income levels—remains the same whether (1) the items are estimated as shown; (2) interest in the domestic and international items is scored 1, 2, 3 and combined into additive scales that violate the ordinal nature of the variables, or (3) the percentage of respondents who closely follow each item is averaged across domestic and international issues and Social Security by income level (a bivariate model).

monotonically with income. Even so, Social Security is less common at high income levels, different from the usual participation pattern.

Social Security-based contributing also rises at first with income and then drops. Making contributions of any kind, even those based on a concern with Social Security, is unlikely at low income levels, where interest in the issue is great but activity limited by income constraints. Such activity becomes more likely at moderate income levels, where there is more disposable income but still substantial dependence on Social Security. As predicted, participation falls at high income levels (Figure 3c). Although voting and contributing do not fall monotonically with income as does contacting, both are less common among high-income than among low- and moderate-income seniors.

Mobilization

Social Security may be of such importance to low-income seniors that they recognize their interest in the program without being prompted by other political actors. Perhaps the impact of government action is as "transparently obvious" to seniors as it is to government employees and farmers, who recognize the effects of government policies on their well-being and who participate at rates higher than predicted by their socioeconomic status (Lipset [1959] 1981, 196–97; see Lewis-Beck 1977 and Wolfinger and Rosenstone 1980).

As it turns out, the unusual pattern of seniors' interest in Social Security is reinforced by a distinctive mobilization pattern: Low-income seniors are as likely as their higher-income counterparts to be mobilized by the political parties, and moderate-income seniors are even more likely.

Figure 4 shows the likelihoods that seniors and nonseniors at various income levels were contacted by a political party during the election season, after controls for other demographic characteristics. For nonseniors, the likelihood of being mobilized rises with income. This is the pattern found in past research: High-income individuals are more likely to be asked to participate than their low-income counterparts.

Once again, senior citizens are different. The likelihood of party mobilization during the campaign season rises with income to a point but then falls at high income levels. Parties may appear to be acting rationally, conserving limited resources by declining to mobilize high-income seniors, who already vote at high rates. Presumably mobilizing highly participatory affluent nonseniors would be a waste as well, yet that is precisely what the parties do, making the different pattern for seniors all the more notable. Thus lower- and moderate-income seniors are more likely to participate with regard to Social Security not only because of their great interest in the program, but also because they are mobilized to politics at high rates.

DISCUSSION

The role of Social Security helps explain the high rates of political participation by seniors. Among nonseniors, the extremely modest activity levels of the less affluent pull down the overall participation rate. In contrast, low-income seniors participate at higher rates than would be predicted by their resource levels because of their dependence on Social Security. On average, seniors receive almost half their income from Social Security (Moon and Mulvey 1996, 29). Like some other special societal groups—farmers and government employees—seniors have a large stake in government action. Social Security is especially important to poorer seniors—the 40% of seniors who receive four-fifths of their income from the program. Their dependence on Social Security boosts their participation and works against the usually positive income-participation gradient.

Social Security's role is both important and unusual. The Social Security-based participation of low-income seniors is a rare instance in which self-interest is highly influential. Researchers often have difficulty detecting self-interested behavior (Citrin and Green 1990). People fail to act in their self-interest because of informational or cognitive limitations (Simon 1983) or because they choose as social creatures to act altruistically (Sen 1977; Stoker 1992; Wildavsky 1987). With Social Security, though, the stakes are "visible," "tangible," "large," and "certain" (Citrin and Green 1990, 18), and there is no moral prohibition on the exercise of their self-interest. 11 Social Security is a non-means-tested entitlement program to which recipients or their spouses contributed during their years in the workforce. Although academics and policy experts may assert that the system is really a pay-as-you-go intergenerational transfer program and that the relationship between one's contributions and one's benefits is indirect, the program is popularly understood as an insurance program. As Franklin D. Roosevelt said, Social Security's self-contributory design gives recipients a "legal, moral, and political right" to their benefits (quoted in Schlesinger 1958, 309).

Social Security also is distinctive in American politics as a mobilizer of a low-income group. To the extent that economic self-interest influences behavior, it often simply augments the high participation rates of the most active segments of the citizenry. Those affluent homeowners who opposed Proposition 13 were "the most politicized and vocal" portion of the population to begin with (Sears and Citrin 1982, 220). It is low-income seniors, however, who are most active on the basis of Social Security, able to be so because of their sufficiently high participatory capacity, interested in doing so because of their great stake in the program, and recruited to do so in part because Social Security creates a basis for mobilization.

&lt;sup>11</sup> In addition, the self-interest that is influential here is the rarest and most rigorous type: "narrow" self-interest, the pursuit of "relatively short-run material benefits for the actor or his immediate family," to use David Sears's definition (found in Citrin and Green 1990, 4). Usually scholars are unable to detect the influence of self-interest even when it is more broadly defined.

Indeed, this bottom-up self-interest story is augmented by a top-down mobilization process. Senior citizens are one of the few groups in American society in which both the high- and the low-income members are mobilized with regard to economic issues, and not only by the political parties as shown here, but also in other venues. One of every two seniors belongs to the AARP, and as with voluntary group membership in general, AARP members are more educated, affluent, and white than nonmembers (Campbell 2000). However, poorer seniors, unlike many other lowincome groups, also have sources of mobilization, political information, and political discussion. Thousands of senior centers and nutrition programs across the country, many run by the Administration on Aging, attract lower-income seniors. Inevitably seniors hear political discussion and policy news. One study from the 1960s found that although seniors active in old-age social welfare clubs were demographically similar to nonmembers, club members were more likely to talk about health and medical care (25% versus 2%) and other problems of old age (16% to 5%), were more likely to believe that "older people ought to organize to demand their rights" (68% to 39%), and were more likely to believe that older people ought to be more active in politics (74% to 48%) (Rose 1965). Hence, low-income seniors both take a keen interest in government policy and learn in these group settings how to make their preferences heard in the political arena.

CONCLUSION

According to Lipset ([1959] 1981, 190), one factor affecting turnout is the "relevance of government policies to the individual." Groups that see a visible effect of government policy on their well-being—including government employees, farmers, veterans, and, as shown here, Social Security recipients—have a great stake in government activity and participate at higher rates than would otherwise be expected (Lipset [1959] 1981, 190–94; Wolfinger and Rosenstone 1980).

The Social Security case is also unusual and important because the program's participatory effects are most pronounced for low-income seniors. Ordinarily it is difficult to mobilize poorer individuals, but lower-income seniors' dependence on Social Security is so great and so obvious that seniors are able to act in a self-interested manner, protecting their Social Security benefits. Social Security thus provides an important instance of self-interest significantly influencing participatory behavior. It would not be an exaggeration to conclude that the program is largely responsible for the creation of the senior constituency and its electoral significance.

Issue-specific interest. Of course, everyone is more interested in some things being carried in the news than in others. To take some different kinds of examples—Is news about [each item in turn] something you have recently been following fairly closely, or just following casually, or not paying much attention to? Which prices are going up or down and how much?: the legislation to reduce income taxes; the legislation to deal with changes in Social Security; interest rates being charged by banks; attempts by Seagrams, Mobil, Texaco, DuPont, and others to buy Conoco; the marriage of Prince Charles and Lady Diana; the hunger strikes by Irish prisoners; the riots in England; relations between Israel and the Arab countries; the situation in Poland; the air traffic controllers' strike. (Coded 1 if followed closely, 0 if followed casually or not much).

Income. Now here is a list of income categories. Would you call off the letter of the category that best describes the combined annual income of all members of this household, including wages or salary, pensions, interest or dividends, and all other sources? Nine-category variable.

Race. Recorded by interviewer. Coded 1 if black, 0 otherwise.

Gender. Coded 1 if male, 0 if female.

Marital status. Are you married, single, widowed, separated, or divorced? Coded 1 if married, 0 otherwise.

Work status. Are you at present employed, either full-time or part-time? [If no]: Are you a housewife, unemployed, a student, retired, or what? Coded 1 if working, 0 otherwise.

Education. What was the last grade of regular school that you completed—not counting specialized schools like secretarial, art, or trade schools? Seven-category variable.

APPENDIX B: CITIZEN PARTICIPATION STUDY QUESTION WORDINGS

Social Security voting. In the past five years, have you taken into account the position of a candidate in relation to Social Security Payments in deciding how to vote? Coded 1 if yes, 0 if no.

Social Security contacting. In the past five years, have you contacted a government official to complain about Social Security Payments? Coded 1 if yes, 0 if no.

Social Security contributing. In the past five years, have you given a campaign contribution based, at least in part, on your concern about Social Security Payments? Coded 1 if yes, 0 if no.

Income. Which of the income groups listed on this card includes the total 1989 income before taxes of all members of your family living in your home? Please include salaries, wages, pensions, dividends, interest, and all other income. [If uncertain: What would be your best guess?] Sixteen-category variable.

Race. What is your race? [Which category describes your racial background?] Coded 1 if black, 0 otherwise.

Gender. Coded 1 if male, 0 if female.

Marital status. Are you currently married, living in a marriage-like relationship, widowed, divorced, separated, or have you never been married? Coded 1 if married, 0 otherwise.

Work status. Last week, were you working full-time for pay, working part-time for pay, going to school, keeping house, or something else? Coded 1 if working, 0 otherwise.

Education. What is the highest grade of regular school that you have completed and gotten credit for? If necessary say: By regular school we mean a school that can be counted toward an elementary or high school diploma or a college or university degree. Did you get a high school diploma or pass a high school equivalency test? Do you have any college degrees—that is, not including degrees from a business college, technical college, or vocational school? What is the highest degree that you have earned? Eight-category variable.

Age. Calculated from year born.

APPENDIX C: 1996 NATIONAL ELECTION STUDY QUESTION WORDINGS

Party mobilization. As you know, the political parties try to talk to as many people as they can to get them to vote for their candidate. Did anyone from one of the political parties call you up or come around and talk to you about the campaign this year? (v961162; coded 1 if yes, 0 if no.)

Income. Please look at page 21 of the booklet and tell me the letter of the income group that includes the income of all members of your family living here in 1995 before taxes. This figure should include salaries, wages, pensions, dividends, interest, and all other income. Twenty-four-category variable.

Race. (v960067; coded 1 if black, 0 otherwise). Gender. (v960066; coded 1 if male, 0 if female).

Marital status. Are you married now and living with your (husband/wife)—or are you widowed, divorced, separated, or have you never married? (v960606; coded 1 if married, 0 otherwise).

Work status. We'd like to know if you are working now, temporarily laid off, or are you unemployed, retired, permanently disabled, a homemaker, a student, or what? (v960616; coded 1 if working, 0 otherwise.)

Education. What is the highest grade of school or year of college you have completed? Did you get a high school diploma or pass a high school equivalency test? What is the highest degree that you have earned? I used the summary of the above three questions (v960610). Seven-category variable.

Age. Calculated from year born (v960605).
